CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

FIFTY-FOURTH CONGRESS FIRST SESSION

in the Forty-ninth Congress, which give the circumstances of incurrence of soldier's disability.

We believe that the cause of soldier's death was due to injuries received in service, and therefore earnestly recommend the passage of the bill after being amended by adding "at the rate of $12 per month."

[House Report, Forty-ninth Congress.]

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7748) granting a pension to John H. Stucker, submit the following report: The evidence submitted in this case shows that claimant enlisted in Company B, Eighteenth Missouri State Militia, in September, 1862, and was discharged April 23, 1864. On July 19, 1875, he filed application for pension, alleging gunshot wound of left hand, received at Alpha, Mo., while disarming a rebel bushwhacker. The claim was rejected November 18, 1875, on the ground that he was not pensionable under existing law. The following evidence was submitted in the case:

William Dunlop, lieutenant of Company B, Thirtieth Missouri Militia, testifies that he has known claimant since 1861, and that while in the line of duty as sergeant of said company, in the northeast part of Livingston County, Mo., claimant received a gunshot wound of left hand, from which wound he was totally disabled from military duty, and from the use of said hand ever since. Affiant says he knows the facts of which he testifies from personal knowledge.

Jonathan T. Wilson testifies that he was a member of the same company, and that, while acting under regular orders in disarming rebels, they attempted to disarm one Wilson, an acknowledged rebel and bushwhacker, when said Wilson fired upon and shot said Stucker in the hand, tearing it all to pieces; that affiant was the first to pick up said Stucker after his being shot.

Newton Buckner testifies that he was with claimant when he was shot; that they were detailed to disarm rebels and bushwhackers, and while in the line of duty Stucker was shot in the hand, badly mangleing it. Affiant took care of claimant until he was able to be around again.

Dr. S. W. Elmore testifies that he treated him professionally for the wound immediately after he received it, and as long as he needed medical attendance.

The examining surgeon at Jameson, Mo., reports, August 12, 1875, that—"The left hand is useless from gunshot wound; aperture of entrance at middle of second metacarpus, destroying that and third metacarpus, shot scattering and making exit at different points on outside of hand, several shots remaining encased on palm or surface of hand; hand very much deformed; bones of carpus enlarged and wrist ankylosed; fingers drawn tight to palm and useless; very painful at wrist and elbow joint."

This regiment was enrolled and mustered into service under a general order of the commanding officer, Department of Missouri, and was under the command of United States Army officers. Claimant did not file his application for pension until after the expiration of the limitation provided for in section 4903, Revised Statutes, and therefore the claim cannot be allowed in the Pension Office.

Claims of this character have invariably been recommended by the committee and allowed by Congress, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. Why is an attempt made to fix the rate of pension in the bill? Why not let her be pensioned according to law?

Mr. DOCKERY. The committee fixed that. I do not know what legal reason there was for it.

Mr. LOUD. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the committee almost invariably fix the rate of pension of a widow who is not entitled to a pension under the law at a greater sum than she would receive if she were entitled to a pension under the law. I have repeatedly upon this floor stated my objections to that mode of procedure. I do not believe any widow who is not entitled to a pension under the general law should receive a greater rate of pension than a widow who is entitled to a pension under the law. This bill, I think, seeks to give this widow more than the law would give her. If not, why insert the words "$12 per month"?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think the rate is not greater than she would be legally entitled to.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is it not $12?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think that is the law.

Mr. PICKLER. The evidence clearly shows that the husband of this woman was wounded in the Army. A witness testifies that he was present when his hand was shot to pieces by bushwhackers, and that he died from diseases contracted in the service. That being so, his widow would be entitled to $12 under the law had he been in the service regularly; but being in the Missouri State Militia, he was not regularly in the United States service, and so his widow must come to Congress for relief.

Mr. Speaker, the committee have recommended exactly what this woman would have got had her husband been in the United States service. She can not get it under the general law for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. LOUD. I ask the gentleman a question, and I want him to answer in all sincerity. If this woman be placed upon the pension roll under the limitations of law by direction of Congress, would she not get the pension to which she would be entitled? If her husband died as the result of his service, she would get $12 a month, and if he did not die as the result of his service in the Army she would get $8. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. PICKLER. Of course there is no question about that, but I think there is no question about his dying from diseases contracted in the service.

Mr. LOUD. Why not let the Pension Office determine these cases?

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from California must understand that the Pension Office will not consider this case and have rejected it because the man was not in the service of the United States.

Mr. LOUD. But you remove that bar by this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. It is shown that this man was wounded in the Army. And this woman is equitably and legally entitled to this pension.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I know he was shot in the hand, but he did not die as the result of that wound. There is no use in talking about that.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman seems to think that a shot in the hand would not be very much of a wound.

Mr. LOUD. Permit me to say that he did not die in 1864 as the result of that gunshot wound in his hand, received thirty years ago.

Mr. PICKLER. He did not have to do that. I think this is a very meritorious case, and the ordinary amount.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REPORTS OF OFFICERS, WORLD'S COLUMBIAN COMMISSION.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a memorial of the board of reference and control of the World's Columbian Commission in reference to reports of officers, and to have it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to have a memorial read and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CORLISS. I do not care to occupy the time of the House by having it read. It can be printed in the RECORD for the information of members. It is with reference to the publication of the proceedings of the World's Fair Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to printing the same in the RECORD?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to ask what propriety there is in printing such a paper in the RECORD?

Mr. CORLISS. The acts of the officers have been authorized to be printed by a prior act of Congress. This is a report of their proceedings and of the publications that are being made. It is information to Congress as to what they are doing.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is this a continuous board?

Mr. CORLISS. A continuous board until 1898.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. And are we to have these reports every year?

Mr. CORLISS. The publications are being made, and this is with reference to the work.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Why not give the memorial to the newspapers?

Mr. CORLISS. Why, because this is the proper body to which such memorials should be presented.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Whose report is this?

Mr. CORLISS. It is the report of Senator Palmer, the president of the World's Fair Commission.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Has this report passed through the hands of any committee of the Commission?

Mr. CORLISS. It certainly has, and it is simply a statement of what they are doing.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why should it go in the RECORD?

Mr. CORLISS. Simply to furnish information to the country of the acts of that Commission.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will permit.

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is this also to be spread on the minutes of the Senate?

Mr. CORLISS. I understand that is to be done.

Mr. McMILLIN. It will make about a column of the RECORD. That is about the extent of it.

Mr. CORLISS. It will hardly make that.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I understand the gentleman says this is also to be spread on the minutes of the Senate?

Mr. CORLISS. I am not at liberty to say that it will be.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state that it is not done where the documents are presented the same day. If they were presented to the House and the Senate on the same day it would only be printed once.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Has it already been printed as a part of the Senate proceedings?

Mr. CORLISS. I can not say positively as to that. I only know that it has been presented to the Senate, but whether it was printed there I do not know.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If it should be ordered to be printed today in both bodies it will only be printed once.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the law require this Commission to report to Congress?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is there any objection to printing it in the form of a document instead of printing it in the RECORD?

Mr. CORLISS. I am simply asking what the president of the Commission asks to have done by this House, for the information of the country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is already in the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I object. It is already in the RECORD.

RELIEF OF OFFICERS AND CREWS OF THE GUNBOATS KINEO AND CHOCUBA.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3294) for the relief of officers and crews of the United States gunboats Kineo and Chocuba. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $12,474.73 be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the officers and crews of the United States gunboats Kineo and Chocuba who were engaged in duty thereon in the year 1864 their pro rata shares thereof, being for salvage money, their due on account of saving and taking up 49 bales of cotton, said amount having been realized from the sale of said cotton and the same converted into the United States Treasury.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to ask if this bill has been reported by any committee?

Mr. FISCHER. It has been reported favorably by the Committee on Claims. I am perfectly willing to make an explanation of the bill. The report covers 88 pages.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to have the report read.

Mr. FISCHER. All the 88 pages?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It is a serious thing, passing these bills for claims arising during the war.

Mr. FISCHER. Will the gentleman permit me to make a short explanation of the bill, the facts concerning which are detailed in the report?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would ask the gentleman to include in his statement the reason why this bill was not considered on some Friday. Every Friday is set apart under the rules for the consideration of just such bills as this.

Mr. FISCHER. Will the gentleman point to me any Friday when such bills have been considered?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Every Friday is set apart for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. FISCHER. If the gentleman will show me some way to reach the consideration of this bill on a Friday I will be very glad.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It can be done by enforcing the rules of the House. The rules of the House set apart every Friday for the consideration of these bills.

Mr. FISCHER. I trust that the gentleman will not insist upon that objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman to show why the bill was not considered on one of these Fridays.

Mr. FISCHER. Simply because it was impossible to have it considered. The reason for this bill is this: This matter has already been in the United States courts, as the report shows. Twenty-seven days—

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What court?

Mr. FISCHER. The United States court for the eastern district of Louisiana. Judgment was awarded in favor of these people. The amount was fixed by that judgment, but before the judgment of the court was rendered the money was ordered to be covered into the United States Treasury, and the judge of the court at that time was not aware of the fact that Congress, twenty-seven days prior to the award of this judgment, had passed a law permitting payment direct to the claimants, and he so certifies, and that is part of this report. Believing that he had no power to order the money paid directly to the claimant, he ordered it to be covered into the Treasury. I have here an extract from the books of the Treasury Department (Treasury Book No. 2, page 19) showing that this money had been received by the Department under this very judgment, and that it was laid aside awaiting action of Congress directing its payment to the rightful owner.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. There are about eight hundred thousand or a million claims in the same category, I believe.

Mr. FISCHER. I think the gentleman must be mistaken about that. This is a peculiar case. This is a case under a judgment of a court, where the money has been ordered to be paid to these people and has been covered into the Treasury awaiting action by Congress. As I have said, the judge was not aware that an enabling act had been passed by Congress authorizing him to order the money paid directly to the claimants, and that is the reason why it was covered into the Treasury.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Yes; but I should like some explanation of why these men should be paid anything.

Mr. FISCHER. It is for property—cotton—recovered and sold for their benefit. It is salvage money.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. As I understand, this is an obligation of the Government not under contract?

Mr. FISCHER. Not under contract.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. If it were an obligation under contract I do not think the House would consent to its consideration, because I observed yesterday that where the Government was under a contract obligation recognized by the proper department the House would not sanction its payment.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does my colleague [Mr. FISCHER] mean to say that this is a claim sounding in tort rather than in contract?

Mr. FISCHER. The gentleman's peculiar ability in construing law will enable him to put any construction upon it that he pleases. [Laughter.]

WILLIAM GRAY.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 953) for the relief of William Gray.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue to William Gray, late a private in Company D, First Regiment of New York (Lincoln) Cavalry, a warrant for the sum of $174.63, in full for his claim heretofore allowed by the Treasury Department, and for which claim the said Department issued to said William Gray Treasury pay warrant No. 2000, dated September 20, 1865, which warrant was paid on a forged indorsement of the name of said claimant without his authority or knowledge, and for which he has never received any return or benefit; and said reissued warrant shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask for a brief explanation of this bill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, the amount involved in this bill is one hundred and seventy-four dollars and some cents. The report shows that it is in payment for a horse and equipments, the horse having been killed and the equipments captured in one of the engagements of the Army of the Potomac. The claimant was a private soldier in a New York cavalry regiment the members of which owned their own horses and equipments. I think the regiment was under the command of General Slocum. In 1864, shortly after the loss, Mr. Gray was at Washington and presented his claim to the Treasury Department. The claim was investigated and allowed, and a Treasury warrant was drawn in payment of the amount fixed, one hundred and seventy-four dollars and some cents. That warrant was mailed to him as directed, in care of somebody in Washington, but it never reached him. It was obtained from the post-office by somebody else, Mr. Gray's name was forged on the back of it, several indorsements of banks were forged upon it, and it finally reached the Treasury and was paid. The claimant never received it or heard of it. If the amount had been large enough he might have gone into the United States courts and sued for it, but as the amount was only $174 he could not do that, and it is to pay him this amount that this bill has been introduced.

Mr. LOUD. Does not the gentleman fear that the claimant's own agent got this warrant?

Mr. CONNOLLY. No, sir. The Treasury officials who investigated the matter say that they had no means of knowing who got it, but manifestly the indorsement is forged. I may add that one of the banks indorsing the draft is situated here in Washington, so that the Government may bring a suit at any time to recover the amount.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. What evidence is there of the forgery?

Mr. CONNOLLY. The proper official of the Treasury Department reports it as his judgment that the indorsement is a forgery, he having compared the signature with the other signatures on file in the case.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. There has never been any investigation by a court?

Mr. CONNOLLY. No, sir; the investigation was made in the Treasury Department, and the officials of that Department report that there is no question as to forgery.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman has said that the Government can proceed against this indorser.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the Government may proceed against the indorser, is there anything to prevent the claimant himself from proceeding for money had and received to his use?

Mr. CONNOLLY. He could not proceed for money had and received. He would be compelled to proceed on the draft, and he can not get the draft from the Department, where it is on file. Another thing which prevents him from taking that course is that the amount is only $174, and he is a poor man living in central Illinois, so that it would be impossible for him to come here and institute and carry on a suit for such an amount.

Mr. McMILLIN. But that would not prevent him from proceeding against the individual who got his check.

Mr. CONNOLLY. He does not know who that individual is. One of the banks that indorsed this draft is the First National Bank of New York, and another is Lewis Johnson & Co., of this city. There are several indorsements upon the draft, all of which are set out in the report, so that the Department is advised of all the banks through whose hands it passed, and the Government has a right of action if it chooses to exercise it. The fact is, however, that this man never was paid.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What committee reported this bill?

Mr. CONNOLLY. The Committee on Claims. It was reported by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANLY].

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Committee on Claims or the Committee on War Claims?

Mr. CONNOLLY. The Committee on Claims. This is not a war claim.

Mr. PITNEY. Was this claim ever reported before?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir; in the preceding Congress it was reported and it passed the House, but by neglect it failed to get through the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is a bill to pay a private claim, reported by the Committee on Claims?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman understands, I suppose, that this bill would be in order for consideration on Friday under the rules of the House?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I understand that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, if the gentleman gets this claim through now, will that abate his ardor in helping us to get Fridays for the consideration of other private claims? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. I do not know about that. I have been here every Friday attending to the business of the House as it has come up, and I expect to be present every Friday while the session lasts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We are very anxious to get those claims settled.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, this will be one bill out of the way. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I understand him to say that this claim has been paid by the Government once?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes; it has been paid on a forged indorsement.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. What is to prevent the beneficiary from suing the indorsers?

Mr. CONNOLLY. For such a sum as $174 this man could hardly be expected to sue a bank in New York City or in the city of Washington.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Do you think the Government should pay this amount twice?

Mr. CONNOLLY. No, sir; the Government can recover it. It is the fault of the Government that the money was paid by it on a forged indorsement.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Government permits drafts with forged indorsements to be paid at the Treasury Department?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Why, sir, I can say from my own experience that in at least forty different cases I have secured recoveries for the Government on Treasury warrants the indorsements on which had been forged.

Mr. HULICK. Allow me to say that in a case which I had occasion to examine within a few days a claim of an engineer for salvage during the war was paid by the Government on a forged power of attorney. The man who was entitled to the money never received a dollar.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The Government in these cases can always recover, because no statute of limitations ever bars it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Was this draft or warrant when issued transmitted by the Government to the person to whom the claimant directed it should be sent?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Oh, yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then, as the Government took the course directed by the claimant, does the gentleman think the liability of the Government continues?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Beyond any question it does, as a matter of law.

Mr. McMILLIN. When the Government had delivered the draft in the manner which the claimant himself directed?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir. In this respect the Government stands in the same position as a bank; if it pays money on a forged indorsement it does so on its own risk, of course.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. I should like to ask a question.

A MEMBER. Oh, let this claim for $170 go.

Mr. COX. I do not raise any question as to the amount of the claim; but there are hundreds of claims as meritorious as this coming from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. COX. Why should one claim be privileged over another?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I know no reason—

Mr. COX. Then I object.

FRENCH W. THORNHILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

A bill (H. R. 3005) granting a pension to French W. Thornhill.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Dr. French W. Thornhill, of Spring Valley, Minn., at the rate of $30 per month, and who shall be entitled to receive such amount from and after the approval of this act, subject to the rules and limitations prescribed by law.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3005) granting a pension to French W. Thornhill, submit the following report:

A bill identical with the one under consideration was passed by both Houses of the Fifty-third Congress, but reached the President so late that it did not receive Executive approval. The same bill was passed by the House in the Fifty-second Congress. In addition to the evidence laid before previous Congresses, the claimant has filed with your committee a number of affidavits of a medical character showing that he is at present totally incapacitated from the practice of his profession and almost totally incapacitated from the performance of labor of any kind by reason of the increasing disability directly attributable to the wound he received during the war.

Your committee believe this to be a very meritorious measure and recommend its passage, incorporating as part of our report the statement of facts contained in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Fifty-third Congress, as follows:

"Dr. French W. Thornhill, of Spring Valley, Minn., is the son of Maj. S. P. Thornhill, deceased, a surgeon of the Eighth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry. The said Dr. French W. Thornhill was in the years 1861 and 1862 present with said regiment, although not mustered into the United States military service, and assisted and rendered valuable and efficient service, acting as assistant to his father in caring for the sick and wounded.

"He was with said regiment in the following engagements: Iron Mountain Bridge, Missouri; Fredericktown, Mo.; Fort Henry, Fort Donelson, New Madrid, Island No. 10, Pittsburg Landing or Shiloh, Farmington, and Iuka Springs. After the battle of Iuka Springs the said Dr. French W. Thornhill, by order of General Rosecrans, was sent back to take charge of a neutral hospital, where he remained until the battle of Corinth, where he received while in the discharge of his said duty as acting assistant surgeon of said regiment a gunshot wound in his right hip from a rifle ball, whereby he was disabled.

"The evidence also shows that the said Dr. French W. Thornhill, at the battle of Farmington, from exposure and overexertion in rendering aid and caring for the sick and wounded, received and sustained a sunstroke and contracted dysentery and chronic diarrhea, and is now greatly disabled."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. As I understand, this man was not a commissioned surgeon?

Mr. TAWNEY. He was not. He was never mustered into the service. That is the reason this bill is here. Otherwise his pension would have been granted and paid long ago under the general law.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What amount of money is asked?

Mr. TAWNEY. Thirty dollars a month—the same amount authorized by the bill for his relief which was passed in the last Congress and also in the Fifty-second Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. This bill is to pension him as an assistant surgeon?

Mr. TAWNEY. I thought the gentleman asked me what amount the bill carried. The rate of pension proposed is $30 a month.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. But why should he receive so much as that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because he is almost totally incapacitated for the performance of labor of any kind.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Disabled by reason of the gunshot wound?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Why has not this bill been considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. TAWNEY. For the reason that it has not been reached. It was considered at a Friday night session in the Fifty-third Congress, and also in the Fifty-second Congress. This is the third Congress in which the bill has been reported favorably. In the Fifty-second Congress the bill was passed too late to receive favorable consideration in the Senate. It passed both Houses in the Fifty-third Congress, but too late to receive the approval of the President. As it is getting late in the present session, and as I do not wish the bill to fail again as it has failed heretofore, I have asked unanimous consent for its consideration and passage at this time.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Why was not Dr. Thornhill commissioned?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because he was under age. He went out with his father, a mere boy. He was too young to be commissioned or to be mustered into the service.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the usual pension for an assistant surgeon?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions kindly inform us?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Seventeen dollars a month.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I suggest that the pension here be fixed at the usual amount for an assistant surgeon.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is a case of almost total disability. The man is almost wholly incapacitated for manual labor. Under these circumstances he would receive under the general law $72 a month. It is not proposed in this case to pension him upon his rank, but upon his physical disability.

Mr. PICKLER. A private gets $30 a month if totally incapacitated for the performance of manual labor. The amount in this case was fixed upon the ground of total incapacity, and not on account of the applicant's rank.

Mr. LOUD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] whether, according to his knowledge and belief, the total disability which this man is stated to be suffering is the result of wounds received in the service?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can answer that question in the affirmative. Last November, before I came to Washington, this gentleman called upon me and exhibited to me his wound. I know from my own observation and knowledge that he is to-day suffering from that wound and that it is the cause of his present disability.

Mr. LOUD. You could only have seen the scar, permit me to say, I judge?

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir; I saw the effect of the wound very plainly. It is visible to any man who will examine it.

Mr. LOUD. Is it open to-day?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is open to-day.

Mr. LOUD. Why did not he apply in 1864 or 1865?

Mr. TAWNEY. He has applied to the Pension Department. The claim was pending there for a long time—

Mr. LOUD. What date?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not now recall the exact date; but until the Department decided that on account of the fact that he was not mustered into the service he could not receive a pension his claim was pending, and when rejected on that ground he came to Congress for relief.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman states that this disability arises from the wound received in the service?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am entirely satisfied that that is the case.

Mr. LOUD. I shall interpose no objection under the circumstances stated by the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. I could satisfy the gentleman in a moment if I could describe to him the condition of this man's wound.

Mr. LOUD. I am satisfied.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Is he practicing medicine now?

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir; except in his office.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire first, if the gentleman will permit me, to make a request for unanimous consent with reference to some printing—

The SPEAKER. That can not be done unless the demand for the regular order is withdrawn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will allow me to ask unanimous consent with reference to a bill already passed.

Mr. TALBERT. I withdraw the demand for the regular order for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. It must be withdrawn absolutely, the Chair would suggest. The Chair can not accept a conditional withdrawal.

Mr. TALBERT. I withdraw the demand.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this statement: That at the close of the debate on what is known as the "filled-cheese" bill on Saturday I promised one or two gentlemen to ask unanimous consent to enlarge the privilege given to print on the subject of that bill. I overlooked the fact at the time, and now ask unanimous consent that gentlemen may print remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is there a limit to the time?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, we can fix a reasonable limit.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It has been usual to fix a limit to these requests.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Say, for ten days.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would be satisfactory, and is about the usual limit.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether it is proposed to print books, pamphlets, and political documents under this leave?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I will say, in response to the gentleman from New York, that he has been already granted liberty by consent of the House, and other gentlemen desire the same liberty to extend their remarks or to print remarks in the RECORD upon the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I do not desire any liberty in that direction. I do not believe in it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. These are gentlemen who represent dairy districts, who want to publish some remarks legitimate to the bill. I think there will be no abuse of the privilege.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the request of the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman asks consent that members may be permitted to print in the RECORD remarks on what is known as the "filled-cheese" bill within the next ten days. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. Remarks of their own?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly; their own remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be very glad to incorporate that into the request. Is there objection, with the modification suggested?

There was no objection.

THOMAS M. ELLIOT.

Mr. HULICK. I desire to present for consideration the bill (H. R. 989) to amend the military record of Capt. Thomas M. Elliot, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

AMENDMENT OF JOINT RESOLUTION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to submit, before the regular order is proceeded with, the following resolution of the Senate, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the two Houses be authorized to correct enrolled joint resolution S. R. 116 by striking out the word "eight" in the second line of said enrolled joint resolution, and inserting the word "seven" instead.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

REASSESSMENT OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3281) to authorize reassessment for improvement and general taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read and concurred in.

MANAGERS OF THE NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees rests with the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the joint resolution (H. Res. 160) to appoint four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How long does this call rest with the Committee on Military Affairs? They have had one day.

Mr. HULL. We had only one day, and did not get through.

Mr. LOUD. Unless it is in continuation of a bill, I think they have exhausted their time.

Mr. HULL. I will state that we did not, but yielded some time for the purpose of allowing the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to come in with a matter that they wanted to present.

The SPEAKER. They are allowed two days.

Mr. LOUD. Regardless of whether any matter is pending?

The SPEAKER. If the matter under consideration runs into the second day and occupies that day, the time then would be exhausted.

Mr. LOUD. Are they entitled to two days anyway?

The SPEAKER. They are entitled to two days—two morning hours.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the joint resolution which I have indicated, and which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That William B. Franklin, of Connecticut; Thomas J. Henderson, of Illinois; George L. Beal, of Maine, and George W. Steele, of Indiana, be, and the same hereby are, appointed as members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States. William B. Franklin to succeed himself, his term of service expiring April 21, 1894. Thomas J. Henderson to succeed John C. Black, his term of service expiring April 21, 1896. George L. Beal to succeed Francis Fessenden, his term of service expiring April 21, 1896. George W. Steele to succeed himself, his term of service expiring April 21, 1896. All to take effect April 21, 1896.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is recognized.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] desires to be heard on this resolution. I do not want to relinquish the floor. If we can come to an agreement as to time, I should be glad to do it before we enter on the consideration of the resolution. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas if an hour's time will be all that he will want?

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] also desires time, and several of my colleagues from Kansas and perhaps some others wish to speak upon this subject. I should like two hours; and I wish to say in that connection that a less time than that will not be sufficient to discuss this matter as it should be discussed. It is a matter of such consequence and importance to every inmate of the Soldiers' Homes of this nation that the time should be granted.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will consent, I am willing to have two hours' debate. I have no idea that the Committee on Military Affairs will want anywhere near an hour, but I want to have the right to control one hour, and let the gentleman from Kansas control the other hour. It seems to me that with the amount of business that we have, which we are anxious to get through the House to-day, that is all the time we should devote to this. This day will exhaust our call, until all the committees have been again called.

Mr. BLUE. Permit me to say that I hold in my hand affidavits charging W. B. Franklin and General Smith, for whom he is responsible, with cruel and brutal treatment of the inmates of the Home at Leavenworth, Kans. I hold also here a report made by the Inspector-General. This Soldier's Home is a corporation, standing above the Government of the United States, apparently, and it is time that the people of this country should know how the inmates of these Homes are treated. Two hours is a very small time in which to tell them.

Mr. CROWTHER. We should have three hours.

Mr. BLUE. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CROWTHER] insists that we should have three hours. About 2,000 soldiers from Kansas and Missouri are incarcerated in that semiprison at Leavenworth, and they are entitled to a hearing here. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri, I ask three hours, so that this matter may be fully discussed before this House, and so that the people of this nation may know what kind of treatment is being accorded to the soldiers there.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, if we can make no agreement as to time, I will reserve my time and let the gentleman from Kansas proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. HULL (to Mr. BLUE). You are recognized for an hour.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, with that understanding I will proceed. I am satisfied the House will give ample time to hear what I have to say, and for the purpose of this discussion I move as an amendment that the name of W. B. Franklin be stricken out and the name of that gallant soldier and Christian man, Gen. O. O. Howard, be substituted in his place. I desire to have that amendment pending now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. BLUE. I will have it put in writing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] is recognized.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, to begin with, I desire the Clerk to read the remarks of the late Senator Plumb, made six years ago, upon this subject, and found in volume 110, on page 7456 of the RECORD. I desire to have order, if I can, while that is being read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PLUMB. That is true, but that phraseology was intended to embrace the selections of persons not then agreed upon.

I know none of them personally. I have no acquaintance with any of the persons named in the proposition except Mr. Morrill, of Kansas, and Gen. John C. Black, late Commissioner of Pensions. As to both of those men, I take pleasure in saying that I have no doubt they are most excellent persons to be members of this Board, but I want to say that I shall not hereafter vote as to give to any one person longer than six years' service upon this Board. I believe that this Board ought to be very frequently renovated. While the members of it receive no pay, they disburse a very large amount of money, and it is in regard to a service about which the public mind is so sensitive that the disposition is to refrain from criticism. Everyone wishes that these Soldiers' Homes may be of the utmost capacity; that everything possible may be done for the comfort and convenience of these persons in the declining years of their lives, and who gave their services to their country in the hour of its peril.

But I have a much better reason for believing that the management is not as conservative, as wise, as economical, and as free from ordinary selfishness as it ought to be. The Board practically, according to information which I get, consists of one man, and that man is General Franklin, the president, who was an excellent soldier, and no doubt, of course, is a very estimable man, who, from the time which he has given to the position of manager of the Colt's Arms Works, in Connecticut, and from the time which he gave as the manager of the American branch of the Paris Exposition, has taken such a fragment as he thought was necessary in order that the two million and odd dollars appropriated for the maintenance of these Homes might be properly disbursed.

The theory is that each one of these members looks after some one Home. The result is that the Board itself as a Board practically gives no attention to them. I have in mind one of these Homes at which there has been appointed a governor who has been an officer for a number of years and who is conspicuously unfit for the place; whose presence in his position is an affront to the inmates of the Home; who by reason of his habits and of his arbitrary and rough and brutal methods has caused no end of trouble; and by reason of some other things also has contributed to a scandal which, while it has not yet obtained very much vent, at the same time has left everything in an exceedingly unhappy condition, that could not have been if the visitation which this Board ought to give to these Homes had been of a proper character.

The Board makes once a year a trip throughout the country visiting these Homes. It is dined and wineed by the governors of the Homes while on its round. It, of course, gives a certain superficial examination to the Homes, but opportunity is never presented to the inmates of the Homes to make complaint.

I do not say how much trouble exists at any of these Homes or how much room there is for criticism, but I do know that at one of them a condition of things exists which, if it had not been sheltered under the honored name of General Franklin and the other members of this Board, would have been the subject of open comment for years since.

I believe, as I stated in the beginning, that there ought to be a constant change of members, and in consenting now to vote to put in General Franklin I do it with the understanding, not that I have any complaint about him as an individual, but for the reasons which I have stated, that in consenting to him I do it under protest, because there is no time now to make any suggestion of a better arrangement, but with the distinct understanding that if I should be in this place when his term expires I shall insist that some other person shall take his place, and similarly in regard to all the other persons who are in the Board when their terms, respectively, expire, provided always they have had the benefit of a full term. Six years is long enough in one of these places, in an administrative place, especially where the circumstances are such that the Board is practically removed from criticism.

Mr. BLUE. Now, Mr. Speaker, that declaration comes to us as from the grave. It is an enunciation of the belief and understanding of the greatest public man that Kansas ever sent to Congress; one of the ablest in detail and understanding that ever came from the Western portion of this nation; a comrade of unquestioned courage, of great power, and an earnest and devoted friend of his comrades. You will observe that he said six years ago that this Board was practically one man, and that man was W. B. Franklin. That condition has been intensified, and to-day, more than then, he is the spirit that dictates and controls and rules this Board.

It has been charged by his friends and the friends of Smith that I have a personal reason for the prosecution of the claims of my comrades at this time. I denounce that statement as untruthful and false. I have but one purpose in this, and that is to free these poor old men, who are without homes and without the means of support; feeble, indigent, wretched, from the oppression of the drunken and brutal man, who is kept there in control as governor of that Home. I have no other purpose to serve; and when that is accomplished I shall be satisfied; and I assure both Mr. Franklin and his friends that I propose to lay the truth bare as far as I know it, fearless of the consequences, and in justice to these men to see that they may be treated as men who defended the flag deserve to be treated. And now, to show you that I am not unsustained in this matter, I desire to read to this House, as a part of my remarks, a letter received from an ex-governor of Kansas, a gallant officer in the Union Army, a man who served under the immediate eye of that illustrious chieftain, General Grant; who has not only been the governor of the State of Kansas, but was commissioner at the Centennial at Philadelphia, was commissioner of internal revenue for the State of Kansas for a period, has since that been an honored railroad commissioner of the State, and is now commissioner of insurance of the State of Kansas. This comes from no feeble, oppressed old soldier of that Home, but from a man of standing and character, and I desire to read it to this body.

Mr. STEELE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLUE. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. Do you believe that General Smith has taken a single drink of liquor of any kind for the last three years?

Mr. BLUE. I think he has been drunk a hundred times in that time. I have the proof here that will condemn him. He has not only been drunk, but vomiting drunk, crawling drunk.

Mr. STEELE. My understanding is that he is the head of the Keeley League.

Mr. BLUE. For profit.

Mr. STEELE (continuing). Elected at Harrisburg during the last summer as the head of the league.

Mr. BLUE. He is the head of the Keeley League, at $1,200 a year; and that is not all he is getting.

Mr. STEELE. If he is a drunkard I do not know it.

Mr. BLUE. If he is a drunkard you ought to know it.

Mr. STEELE. I know I ought to know it if he is; but I do not believe it.

Mr. BLUE. If what the gentleman does not know about these Homes was put in a book it would make a large volume. He stood in his place here a few days ago and asserted that the general treasurer of this Home was required to give bond to a guaranty company, and when I challenged the statement in regard to that he still insisted, as I understood it, until my colleague, Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, drew the law on him, and he then said he did not so understand it. The next day he arose under a question of privilege and stated that the Secretary of War approved these bonds and that he was mistaken about it.

Mr. STEELE. The RECORD will show what I said about that. Mr. BLUE. And the RECORD will show that out of seven or eight statements you made only one of them was correct. The gentleman is gorged with misunderstanding.

Mr. STEELE. It will show that the gentleman made a statement that he did not back up in the RECORD, and was not true.

Mr. BLUE. I will back it up if there is any question about it. This is the letter:

STATE OF KANSAS, INSURANCE DEPARTMENT,
Topeka, March 29, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: I am constrained by a sense of duty to congratulate and encourage you in your reported struggle to free the United States Soldiers' Home of Kansas from the disgrace and dishonesty which has scandalized the acts and administration of Governor Smith from the day he was placed in charge down to the present time.

It has seemed impossible that he should be able to stifle investigation and come out from every contest unscathed and without trial, or attempt to refute charges of the most grave character, backed by judicial evidence that would convict in any court of law in the land. But the mysterious secret of that support has long been felt to be General Franklin's power and influence, and I felt great hope that he would be left off the Board on expiration of present term. In fact, I felt it impossible for Governor Smith to be held to account for any crime or disgrace with him at the head of the management for his protection.

Feeling this, I addressed a letter to my friend, Gen. NEWTON M. CURTIS, of your House, in which a candid and truthful statement was made of the facts as understood by me. Of that letter I now hand you a carbon for your information. My respect and regard for General Franklin made it very hard to write such a letter, and has kept me from any active part in the troubles here, except in the one appeal to the General, as related in letter to CURTIS. Let me just add that you never put forth labor in a more worthy cause, and I hope our full delegation will join you, and never let up until you get the exact truth uncovered, when you will have earned and all will surely receive the grateful thanks of comrades and people of our State.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. T. ANTHONY.

To Hon. R. W. BLUE, M. C., Washington, D. C.

Now, I am informed that my colleague from New York [Mr. CURTIS] after having received this letter, which Governor Anthony tells me was written for the express purpose of being used here, so that these men might be relieved from the oppression of Smith and Franklin—I am informed, I say, that my colleague from New York never read a word of this letter in committee, and, so far as I know, he never suggested to any member of the committee that the letter had been written to him. If he did, I shall be glad to be corrected now.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas refers to me and asks for an explanation of a matter which affects his side of this discussion. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman now in the line of his argument. I do, however, desire an opportunity to reply to the gentleman's statement. I will in due time make proper reference to Governor Anthony, whom I knew when he was under my command, in command of a battery. I shall give due credit to him and to everybody else concerned, and if there is any attempt to show that which is not creditable to other people, I shall seek to do my share in having the House informed as to the actual facts.

Mr. BLUE. Did you ever exhibit this letter to the committee, or say to the committee or to any member of it anything that was in the letter?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I will answer those questions when I occupy the floor in my own right.

Mr. BLUE. Very well. Then I will read the letter for the information of the House:

TOPEKA, March 19, 1896.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I come to you in this communication in obedience to a duty at once painful and imperative, and it shall be unfolded to you in the utmost candor and brevity, first assuring you that I have no personal end to serve, no enemies to punish nor friends to reward as an inspiration or purpose of this writing.

Perhaps to no one more than myself was due the location of the Western Branch of the Soldiers' Home at Leavenworth, in this State. From the inception of the contest between the seven States permitted to have its location under the law I was in close touch with Gen. W. B. Franklin, president of the Board of Managers. Each visit to Hartford and meeting with him in the West served to fix and establish respect for and confidence in him, until I came as near worshipping at his shrine as it is in my nature to do for a human idol.

The Home was established and its present Governor installed. It almost immediately became apparent that Governor Smith was qualified for the position as a military ruler and rigid disciplinarian, equal to the task of governing, except as to himself. He was low in instinct, base in private character, and corrupt in practice, defying alike the code of morality, temperance, and decency respected as the governing rule of action among gentlemen and honest men.

Maintenance of self-respect compelled me to shun an institution I had struggled with so much pride in locating within our State and in the contentions and scandals that have continually environed its management and history since. Only once have I ever sought by word or act to influence anyone in control, and that in a visit to General Franklin to place in his possession facts, since established by judicial evidence, that Governor Smith was not only degraded morally but corrupt financially in his administration of the Home. I urged that General Franklin owed it to his own good name and the credit of his country to purge the Board and the Home of a publicly recognized disgrace to each in the management of the latter.

From him I received the most positive assurance that the governor should be "subdued" and his arbitrary rule brought to an end; that in view of his reform from a confirmed drunkard under the "gold treatment" it seemed hard to condemn and disgrace him for deeds of the past. He further assured me that the then pending trial between Governor Smith and Dr. Weaver, which involved the corrupt and disgraceful acts of the governor, should stop right then and there as the best solution of the controversy, and a single question of veracity between the parties should be inquired into.

Instead of this the case was opened, the laws of evidence disregarded, and unimpeached testimony shoved aside with contempt, as Manager Cook will undoubtedly tell you—the governor vindicated, and one of the purest, best men in this State or country disgraced.

This action by General Franklin—and it was his action—was and is an enigma to me; so utterly inconsistent with the characteristics of honor and justice which seem to govern him in other relations. One of his most devoted friends intimates to me that he is held in bondage by the governor through some mysterious and unexplainable reasons. But of this I know nothing. You well understand that the weakness of many a great man lies in inability to see a fault in a friend. This element of character put the only cloud that darkens the name and fame of the illustrious Grant. He could not distrust Babcock in the presence of evidence that would convict in any legal tribunal upon the earth.

I am now advised by public information believed to be correct that a change is soon to be made in the Board of Managers, and knowing as I do that you have voice and influence in that action, I come to you with a plea, an entreaty, which I know faithfully voices the wish and will of the people who know the truth, and of every veteran Union soldier in and out of that Home who dare express his feelings, that General Franklin be not continued in his present place, but that some brave and true man, of which our country has so many, be put in the place vacated by him.

I believe this to be the only solution of a matter which keeps the Home in a turmoil, brings humiliation to its veteran occupants, and dishonors the Government it should honorably represent.

Very truly, your friend,

Hon. NEWTON M. CURTIS, M. C., Washington, D. C.

Senator Plumb, in the remarks which I have had read, called attention to the fact that when there was a pretended investigation there some years ago the comrades who are occupants of that Home had no voice in it. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that to-day that Home at Leavenworth is in a state of intimidation from the governor down, and that no man dares to testify before the Board of Managers or before anybody else against the man who occupies the office of governor by virtue of General Franklin's power, without knowing that he must take the road as soon as the investigation is over. I have in my possession a number of letters written by these feeble old men, saying, in substance: "For God's sake, don't use my name. If you do I shall have to take to the road. I have no home; I have no way of maintaining myself, and if it were known to the governor that I had written you this letter I should be driven from the Home immediately."

That is the condition not only of the comrades there but of every officer from the governor down to the humblest occupant of that Home, and when my good friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] stands in the presence of this House and asks me if the governor drinks now, and says that if he does he does not know it, I say to him that if that man could be stood up here as an object lesson he would be the best piece of evidence that could be exhibited to show his dissipated character and his unworthiness to fill the place. No man who looked upon him could avoid seeing it and knowing it.

I have also here a telegram which I desire to read:

TOPEKA, KANS., March 27, 1896.

Hon. R. W. BLUE.

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Letters going to you and Congress from all parts of West to fight Franklin's appointment and depose Smith as governor of Soldier's Home. Forty thousand veterans of Kansas demand it and stand behind you in the fight to accomplish it.

T. J. ANDERSON.
O. A. COULTER.
P. H. CONEY.
GEO. W. VEALE.
O. A. BASSETT.

T. J. Anderson, the first signer of this telegram, is one of the most humane and worthy of all the men in Kansas who followed the flag. Many gentlemen here may know him. He is a man of character and of unquestioned integrity and truthfulness. For many years he was connected with the Santa Fe Railroad as its passenger agent, and he is now connected with the Rock Island road. O. A. Coulter is editor of the Western Veteran, published at Kansas City, the greatest soldiers' paper, I think, published in the western part of the Union. He is a distinguished and worthy soldier. P. H. Coney is a lawyer of character and distinction at Topeka. He was a heroic and brave man in the hour of trial. O. A. Bassett is an honored judge and worthy comrade. George W. Veale is an old Kansan of well-known honesty and integrity. He, too, was a courageous and worthy soldier, having risen to the rank of colonel. He has been many times a member of the Kansas legislature, and has also held other positions of trust and profit. The House has heard the declaration which these men have sent to me. In addition to that, I have a telegram from Capt. George K. Spencer, a man of integrity and character, of Leavenworth County, a retired army officer, in which he says:

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., March 27, 1896.

Fight on floor for Veteran Soldiers' Home. State behind you.

GEORGE K. SPENCER.

I have many other letters here, only a few of which I will read. Here is one from an officer in Dickinson County, Kans.:

ABILENE, KANS., March 24, 1896.

DEAR SIR: Although an entire stranger, I wish to commend you on your fight on Smith, of the Soldiers' Home of this State, and those who try to keep a tyrant over men who have given everything to save their country. It is the worst outrage in this whole country to-day, and every man who is posted and who tries to keep them in their positions deserves political death. If you could hear men, as I do, who have been there say they would as soon be under Wirtz, as Andersonville, you would forgive me for taking your time in reading this letter.

Yours, truly,

Hon. E. W. BLUE.

Here is a letter which was written to Maj. Tom Anderson by an attorney of repute at Leavenworth, Kans., which has been sent to me:

C. H. PATTISON.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., March 22, 1896.

DEAR SIR: I note by the inclosed clipping from the Topeka Capital that you oppose the retention of Governor A. J. Smith here at the Home. As attorney for "the boys" here I am in a position to know and do know, and have evidence enough to hang Smith if his offense were capital. I am ready to go anywhere (even to Washington if necessary) to give evidence of the practices that have come under my observation. If you can be instrumental in giving the men here a good governor, I assure you that you will merit and receive their heartfelt thanks.

Very respectfully,

JESSE GEORGE.

Maj. THOMAS ANDERSON.

Topeka, Kans.

TO FIGHT AGAINST GOVERNOR SMITH—HIS REMOVAL SOUGHT THROUGH THE RETIREMENT OF GENERAL FRANKLIN.

WASHINGTON, March 27.—(Special.)

Maj. Tom Anderson and G. W. Yeale, of Topeka, wired Colonel BLUE to-day urging him to oppose the appointment of General Franklin as a member of the Board of Managers of Soldiers' Home, and to secure the dismissal of Colonel Smith, governor of the Leavenworth Home. The message stated that 60,000 old soldiers would support him in that position. Mr. CALDERHEAD also received a message to-day of like character. Colonel BLUE stated that he would comply with the request. For some time he had been convinced that General Franklin should be allowed to leave the Board, and also he had been of the impression that it would be well to dispense with the services of Governor Smith. He said he would join in the effort to defeat the selection of General Franklin to succeed himself on the Board. The claim is made that General Franklin has for years prevented the dismissal of Governor Smith. It appears that the main object of some of the Kansans is to get rid of Governor Smith, and that they would not now advise fighting General Franklin if he had not prevented the removal of Governor Smith.

The House Committee on Military Affairs, at its first effort over the Franklin trouble, decided 5 to 4 not to name General Franklin to succeed himself, but at the same time they did not name a man to take his place. The next day one member of the committee changed his vote and his name was inserted to succeed himself by a vote of 5 to 4. Mr. TRACEY of Missouri, a member of the committee, has been in the fight against General Franklin. As now planned the name of Gen. Thomas Henderson, of Illinois, will be offered in place of that of General Franklin. In the event the fight on Franklin does not result in his defeat, it is understood that a Congressional investigation covering the Leavenworth Home will be ordered.

I wish next to read a letter of my friend Captain Coney, who, by the way, is a son of Erin, with all the warm blood of an Irishman. His letter is in these words:

TOPEKA, KANS., March 31, 1896.

MY DEAR COMRADE AND FRIEND: I hope that you will not relax your efforts in trying to defeat the appointment of General Franklin, and thereby and therethrough secure the removal of that old brute, Governor A. J. Smith, of the Soldiers' Home. I know and we know that the States of Kansas and Missouri want this, and that at their encampment they will ask it. You are probably more convinced of it than anyone, for you have probably received enough letters to convince you of that fact.

I inclose you a letter that Major Anderson received to-day from Leavenworth, which will show you that the evidence is here to convict Smith of all that he has been charged with. This will enlighten you on this point, and serve you if it reaches you in time to be of service to you.

Make your powers felt in this fight, and it will be appreciated, you may rest assured.

Yours in F., C., and L.,

P. H. CONEY.

Hon. W. R. BLUE,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

These are some of the letters that I have in my possession in reference to this matter. But in order that my good friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] may not go amiss, I have here some affidavits which I wish to read and to which I trust he will give attention:

THE STATE OF KANSAS, Leavenworth County, ss:

I, Miers Powell, of lawful age, being duly sworn, on oath depose and say: That I am a member and inmate of the National Soldiers' Home D. V. S., at Leavenworth, Kans., and have been an inmate of said Home since September 20, 1894.

That I am strictly temperate, never tasting any kind of intoxicating liquor; that I have never been disciplined in any way in said Home, nor up before the governor on any charge; that I was in the hospital of said Home as a patient, being treated for spinal trouble and rheumatism from September 20, 1894, to January 10, or thereabout, 1895; that while in said hospital on Christmas morning, 1894, Gov. A. J. Smith, of said Home, came into the hospital in a state of intoxication; that he was there, as he said, to visit the sick patients, and that he went through the third ward, where I was confined, talking very loud and foolishly; that when he passed my bed, No. 1, I reached out my hand to shake hands with him and said, "How do you do, Governor?" that he waved his hand in a scornful way at me and said, "To hell with you!" and passed on; that he then looked around over the ward, and, motioning with his hand, said, "Why are they vicious? They don't seem to be very vicious," and then turned around and went out.

That after getting out of the hospital I made application to get on the police force of the said Home, and was admitted to the said force April 1, 1895, and was on the said force till September 30, 1895. That while on said force I was in frequent attendance on police court before the governor—said A. J. Smith—in the discharge of my duty as policeman; that when a man came before the governor on a charge who had taken the Keeley treatment and was a member of the Keeley League, the governor invariably favored him and let him off with light punishment, but when a man came who was not a Keeley man he gave him the full penalty. I have seen the governor let Keeley men who had insulted, abused, and resisted the police off with simple reprimand or a light sentence, and in turn punish severely for slight offenses those who were not Keeley men.

It is an understood thing among the veterans at the Home that to be a Keeley man is to be the governor's favorite, and a charge of drunkenness never escapes punishment unless the offender takes the Keeley cure, and I have noticed that to be a fact while a member of the force.

That while in the said hospital a second time I noticed that the majority of the attendants and men who had positions in the hospital were Keeley men, though some of them were then drinking men and drunk while on duty; that notably one Thomas Kennedy, who was one of the nurses at the said hospital, was in the habit of hiding bottles of whisky in the linen room in said hospital and was frequently drunk while on duty, and while in that condition abused the patients shamefully.

That I left the hospital on or about the 17th of November, 1895, and went on the police force of said Home again, of which force I am still a member.

Now, I hope the gentleman will listen to this:

That while on duty on the night of the 7th of February, 1896, on out on the post by the governor's house—I having been assigned to that post for the night—about 1 o'clock at night—

That is late enough, I should think—

I saw Governor Smith driven home "plain drunk"; that when he (the said A. J. Smith) got out of his buggy he had to support himself by catching hold of the wheel, and that he staggered to the door, and it took him some time to find the doorknob; that I was close to him and know that I was not mistaken in his being drunk, and had he been an old veteran I would have considered it my duty to have arrested him.

Later on, it seems, a further statement is made by this same man, to which I challenge the attention of the gentleman from Indiana:

THE STATE OF KANSAS, Leavenworth County, ss:

I, Miers Powell, of lawful age, being duly sworn, on oath depose and say that on the occasion of my seeing Governor A. J. Smith drunk, as set forth in my affidavit made February 11, 1896 (to give a more full and definite description of the matter), it was about twenty minutes past 1 o'clock at night of the day mentioned in my former affidavit, that the said A. J. Smith came home. I had been on the north beat out by the governor's house for about an hour, as I went on at midnight that night; that a few minutes past 12 o'clock I noticed some woman, whom I took to be the governor's wife or daughter, come out of the governor's house and look anxiously out toward the north gate of the Home as though looking for some one; that the woman stood looking for only a moment and then went into the house again; that in ten or fifteen minutes the woman came out again and looked out anxiously toward the north gate, and, seeing no one, went back into the house. That about 1:30 o'clock I heard a noise as of an approaching vehicle in the direction of the north gate, and, looking in that direction, I saw by the glare of the electric light the governor's horse and buggy being driven very rapidly toward his house, the horse being very warm and a fog of smoke ascending from him; that I was walking my beat and not over 30 feet from the governor's house when they pulled up at the door, and could plainly hear all they said and see everything that transpired; that when they drew rein it took some little time for the governor (said A. J. Smith) to pull himself up and out of the buggy; that when he landed on the ground or pavement he caught the wheel of the buggy with both hands and threw himself against the buggy with such force as to rock it pretty badly and the driver said, "Good Lord, don't turn the buggy over;" that the governor muttered some unintelligible reply, and then balancing himself he started for the steps leading to the door; that in going up the steps he went up on all four limbs, throwing his hands to the steps in front of him to assist his ascent; that when he got to the top he straightened up as well as he could and made an effort to get to the door, but struck the wrong side of it; that he then fumbled around for some time and finally found the doorknob, and went in; that the driver stood waiting to see Smith safely inside and then drove on down by where I was standing, and as he passed me he took me, evidently, for Robert Scotland, one of the governor's Keeley men, who at that time was my relief on the beat; and as he passed he said to me, "Bob, Bob, the old man is 'Jesus' full to-night;" that I had my cape over my head and moved on without replying to him; that after Smith had gone upstairs some lady came down and put the light out, and I saw nothing more of him.

THE STATE OF KANSAS, Leavenworth County, ss:

I, John C. Mathews, of lawful age, being first duly sworn, on oath depose and say: That on or about the 4th of February, 1896, I was dishonorably discharged from the Western Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, on charge of repeated absence without leave, repeated drunkenness, and bringing whisky into the Home; that at the time of my discharge I asked the governor of said Home for an honorable discharge, and he (the governor) sent me to the captain with an order for him to make me out an honorable discharge; that the captain, McDowell, told me that he would make out said discharge, whereupon this affiant, thinking that he was at liberty, left said Home, as he had been accustomed to do while in the Iowa Home; and that this affiant came to the city of Leavenworth and rented a shop and remained in business for a few days, thinking that he would return for his papers when the captain had sufficient time to make them out; that after such time this affiant did return, whereupon he was arrested by officers Weist, Smith, and Redman and was brought to the head of the stairs in the police department, where the above-named officers subjected him to torture by twisting his arms; that after being subjected to this severe pain this affiant was then dragged down the said stairs head first, and that while being so dragged this affiant was struck in the head with great force one or more times; that after being dragged to the bottom of the stairs this affiant was dragged by two of the above-named officers, or one of them and Officer Scotland, who then was present, into the turnkey's room; that when in the turnkey's room the arms of this affiant were again twisted so hard as to cause great pain and suffering, after which some of the aforesaid officers seized this affiant by the throat and choked him into insensibility; that one of the above-named officers gouged my right eye so severely that the mark of his violence is on my face yet.

Affiant further alleges that one of the aforesaid officers kicked or struck him a heavy blow while laying almost unconscious after being choked as above stated, from the effects of which this affiant is still suffering.

This affiant also alleges that after he had regained sufficient consciousness and strength to stand up he was put in the straight jacket and thrown into the cell on the hard concrete floor, where he remained for five hours or thereabout.

That after the above and foregoing this affiant was taken before Governor Smith the next morning, charged, as stated before, with repeated absence without leave, repeated drunkenness, and bringing whisky into the Home. As to the first charge, this affiant has stated his reason for being absent; as to the second, this affiant admits having been drunk; but in answer to the third and last, affiant says that he was falsely accused, and that the charge was brought upon the finding of an empty bottle on affiant's person by the above-named officers at the police station.

Now, I do not know whether that is a "plain drunk" or not. It looks to me as though there might be some "trimmings" to it.

Mr. MARSH. Is that man still a member of the police?

Mr. BLUE. I judge not. If he were he would not be there long after that statement, no matter how truthful it may be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this Board has a remarkable way of doing things. Until the law took hold of them they appointed their own inspector, who, of course, found everything correct; because if he did not he would fare like this policeman—he would not remain there long. But there had been scandal after scandal connected with this institution, as Governor Anthony says; and General Averill was sent there as an inspector to make an inspection and report the result of his observations. I hold in my hand a statement of one of the parties who was called before General Averill as a witness.

STATE OF KANSAS, Leavenworth County, ss:

James F. Legate, of lawful age, being first duly sworn according to law, upon his oath deposes and says: When General Averill and Local Manager Cook were investigating some charges preferred against Col. A. J. Smith, governor of the Soldiers' Home near this city, I was called before them and asked if I knew anything about soldiers at the Home having trouble about obtaining money on their pension checks, in reply to which I stated that a soldier from the Home came to my office and asked me to cash a twenty-four dollar pension check. I said to him, "Go to the bank and get it cashed." He replied, "I have been to the bank and they want to charge me a per cent discount. They told me they had to send my check to New York and pay for expressing the money back, and it would cost that much to get the money." Finally I took the check and went with the man to the Manufacturers' National Bank, turned the check in as a personal deposit, and gave the soldier the money. The question was asked what bank the soldier alluded to, but I could not tell, for he only said "The bank."

I was then asked if I had any knowledge of Governor Smith's being intoxicated within the last year or so. I answered that I met Governor Smith at the landing of the elevator in the Ryan Building in this city about a month ago, when he had every appearance of being drunk; his walk was very unsteady, his face bloated, and he had a very strong scent of whisky. I knew him well when sober and have seen him many times when drunk, and from his actions, with the strong scent of whisky added, I felt sure he was drunk. I added that my personal relations with Governor Smith were friendly, as well as with all parties at the Home, and I regretted being called upon to make any statement derogatory to any of them. General Averill asked what reasons I had for thinking Governor Smith was drunk. I said, "He acted like a drunk man, he walked like a drunk man, and he smelt like a drunk man, and I felt positive he was drunk." And each statement was true according to my best judgment. General Averill then said (directing his language to the reporter), "On account of the relations of this gentleman with all parties, you need not put down anything relating to this last matter." And further affiant saith not.

N. E. VAN TUYL, Notary Public.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1894.

I saw Col. A. J. Smith, governor of the Soldiers' Home of Leavenworth, Kans., disgracefully intoxicated at Leavenworth City within the last four months.

AMOS McLOUTH,
Of McLouth, Jefferson County, Kans.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the gentleman from Indiana considers being drunk; but to a plain, common man from the Western country like Kansas these affidavits, I take it, would be some evidence of a man's drunkenness. I could multiply statements of this kind over and over again.

Mr. STEELE. Have not these men been discharged from the Home for insubordination?

Mr. BLUE. I do not know whether they have or not. But Mr. Legate has not been discharged from the Home. He never was connected with it. Neither was Mr. McLouth discharged from the Home. Neither was Governor Anthony, nor T. J. Anderson, nor P. H. Coney, nor O. H. Coulter, nor O. A. Bassett, nor G. W. Veale, nor Jesse George.

Mr. TALBERT. I thought I had heard it stated that Kansas was a prohibition State.

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir; outside of the Government reservation. [Laughter.] And I want to say in this connection that Governor Smith runs the biggest saloon in Kansas, under the shadow of the flag that these men fought to sustain. The Inspector-General, on page 88 of his report, says in regard to this saloon which the governor runs:

The basements of two buildings are occupied for post-fund purposes, one as store and restaurant and the other as beer hall. The sales of the store and restaurant amounted to $14,601.99 during the year, and the expenses for stock to $11,531.75, and for other items out of the profits to $777.77. The profits at the Home store appear to be about 80 per cent. The profits at the beer hall were $13,886.23. At the close of the fiscal year the value of the merchandise on hand was estimated at $3,468.11 against $3,975.80 a year previous, and the cash on hand was reported as $9,948.58 against $3,771. The number of employees under this fund averaged 39 members and 25 civilians, who received a total compensation of $9,705.97, or $157.18 each. At date of inspection the post funds on hand consisted of $5,243.80 on deposit and $277.31 cash in the office safe. The same system of checks adopted at the Milwaukee Home is used for the beer hall here. The cash register at the store was not in use, as it was reported out of order. Possibly the restaurant facilities could be improved. The brewing association from which the beer has been purchased donated a handsome fountain to the Home, and has built an ice house for the storage of beer, and keeps it in repair.

While the same reports, page 63, show the following recapitulation for all the Homes, as follows:

TABLE 15.—Statement showing business of beer hall and employees under post fund.

What, profits! And the man who runs that saloon at the Western Branch is the president of the Keeley League!

And the men out of whom these profits are made are the poor, helpless, homeless defenders of the nation's honor and the preservers of our liberties, and on the same grounds, under the same flag, is operated a Keeley-cure establishment at a cost of $23.30 to each one taking the cure. The saloon keeper deals out his poison at one place on the grounds to make drunkards, at an annual profit of $13,886.23, while at another place he rakes in the shekels at a per capita profit of about $15 per victim.

Mr. TALBERT. That is pretty good for a prohibition State.

Mr. BLUE. This land is segregated from the territory of the State of Kansas, and is owned by the great Government of the United States. It is entirely under its control. In one room is run the beer saloon, to make drunkards of these old men; and in another room the governor of the Home is president of the Keeley cure which is run in connection with the Home, and indorsed by General Franklin.

Mr. HULL (from his seat). That is not unusual. All of the Homes have them.

Mr. BLUE. The gentleman from Iowa says that is the practice in all of the Homes. If that is so, then for God's sake let us have some one appointed on that Board like General Howard, who would put a stop to the drunkenness in these institutions.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will permit me, there is a mistake in his information. At the Marion Home there is no saloon within the grounds, and on the contrary—

Mr. BLUE. How many on the outside?

Mr. STEELE. I was just going to say that, on the contrary, immediately outside, because of the fact that there is no saloon within the ground, these saloons have grown quite rapidly, until there are now 11, I think, of them on the outside. These men sell liquor to the soldiers, and in many cases the soldiers are robbed every pay day—

Mr. BLUE (interrupting). And yet you, in violation of the law, out of the funds in your hands support a civil force on the outside—a police force to protect these people—which the State of Indiana should support.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, no.

Mr. BLUE. Then the Inspector-General does not know, or you do not. I do not believe the gentleman from Indiana does know, as I said before. The Inspector-General in his report, at page 20, says:

Perhaps the Government should pay fully for the light and heat of this Branch Home, but this fund, which is raised among the men themselves, pays 15 per cent of all bills for fuel and oil purchased by the Home, that being the estimated cost to heat the post fund buildings. This fund has also been taxed quite a large sum for the services of men hired by the civil authorities of the surrounding county for patrol duty in connection with the law relating to the sale of liquor within 1½ miles of the Home. It would seem as though this expense for the enforcement of a civil law should not be borne by the Home, nor the additional expense of feeling lawyers to prosecute the violators. But the authorities of the Home speak with great gratification of the results, and as if successful prosecution was impracticable otherwise.

Mr. RAY. If the gentleman from Kansas will permit me, I would like to ask him two or three questions.

Mr. BLUE. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. How many persons compose the Board that has charge of the Home?

Mr. BLUE. Well, eleven, I think, individual members.

Mr. RAY. Eleven on this Board of Managers?

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. And General Franklin is one of them?

Mr. BLUE. Yes.

Mr. RAY. You are making your drive directly at General Franklin as one of the eleven?

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. And he is a member of the Board?

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. You do not charge him with drunkenness, as I understand?

Mr. BLUE. No, sir.

Mr. RAY. These affidavits to which you are referring, and some of which you have read, are directed to the governor of the Home, General Smith. Is that true? That they are all directed to the governor?

Mr. BLUE. That is correct.

Mr. RAY. These charges of drunkenness are all directed at the governor of the Home?

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. Then why do you make an attack on General Franklin, any more than upon the other directors or managers?

Mr. BLUE. These remarks of Senator Plumb, which furnish the keynote to the situation, if the gentleman had listened, charged then and there, six years ago, that he was the man who ran the Home.

Mr. RAY. Then the substance of your charge is this: First, that the governor of the Home becomes grossly intoxicated at times, and is therefore unfitted for the position he holds; second, that the other gentlemen composing the Board of Directors, or managing the Home, are grossly derelict in their duty to permit General Franklin to run and control the Homes in the manner that the gentleman has suggested.

Now, it seems to me that the criticism is aimed indirectly, and I may say directly, at every member of the Board of Managers, and therefore that every one of them ought to be removed if one of them is removed. For you can not single out one man and say that he is to blame; because the other men must know and permit and sanction the disorders to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BLUE. Is that all you wish to ask?

Mr. RAY. Is that statement of your position correct?

Mr. BLUE. No, sir.

Mr. RAY. Why?

Mr. BLUE. For the reason that Mr. Black's place is offered to be supplied by a former member of this House, Thomas J. Henderson, and the place of another member, General Fessenden, to be supplied by General Beal, of Maine, and we have not yet reached the gentleman from Indiana—

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask this question, Do you propose to continue this raid on all of the members, or do you intend to limit it to General Franklin?

Mr. BLUE. Well, I will say in response to the gentleman that "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. HILL. Then, another question. Have you any charge or not to make against the personal character of General Franklin, or are your charges entirely confined to the superintendent or governor of the Home?

Mr. BLUE. If the gentleman had paid attention he would not have misunderstood me. I charged that the inspector's report—the document of the House numbered 288, which any member can get by sending over to the document room for it—that that report shows that either General Franklin is grossly negligent or grossly incompetent or that he is not honest. Now, mistake me not. The report in its detail speaks for itself.

Mr. STEELE. On what page of the report is that?

Mr. BLUE. It runs all through it. I will give you the pages before I get through. I charge that General Franklin knows of that beer saloon at Leavenworth. I charge that he knows of Smith's conduct. I charge that Franklin knows that, in violation of law, he has in his hands at this time certain trust funds that he ought, under the law, by the plain intentment of it, to turn over to the general treasurer. I charge that General Franklin was for many years both president and treasurer of that Home, and that when Congress passed a law that the treasurer should not be one of the Board, he took a man Friday, a clerk, an assistant inspector-general whom he had picked up at one of these Homes as a sergeant, and he put him in there through his influence as the general treasurer, and from that hour to this he has practically controlled and now controls the fund, as he did before.

Mr. HILL. May I ask the gentleman one more question?

Mr. BLUE. Wait one minute. I will call your attention to a matter, that you may be studying on it after you sit down. I will first call the attention of the gentleman to page 8. This is not the matter which I had in mind, but what I do charge is that this report shows that balances in their accounts are forced; that on a page which I will presently find it is shown that their account in one instance lacked $5,000 of balancing. Is that good book-keeping? It is on page 22, and is as follows:

Supplies when issued to the shops are charged off the property records, and thus the stock on hand in the several shops (and in some considerable quantities were found) do not appear as on hand, though not expended except on paper. To have the property accounts rival the money accounts in accuracy and have them both set forth only the exact facts up to the date fixed in the record does not seem an impossibility, nor even very difficult, wherever it is earnestly undertaken. It merely requires enough constant attention to keep the balance accurate without either surplus or shortage. In the knitting shop the value of stock on hand July 1, 1894, was reported as $6,350.30. Received during the year as 7,981.48.

From this there was expended during the year in making 73,144 pairs socks, at $0.1047 per pair, for material 8,181.68.

Value of stock not expended 6,150.10. Balance of stock on hand as reported in shop account 745.61.

Value of stock not accounted for 5,404.49 except $2.50 for 12 stump socks. The explanation of this may be very simple and easy, but perhaps it may be equally easy to keep shop and property accounts so they balance.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman mistakes the meaning of my question entirely. The point I want to get at is whether there is any difference between the gentleman's estimate of General Franklin's services or neglect or incompetence or dishonesty—if it is proper to speak of General Franklin as a dishonest man—if there is any difference between the way the gentleman looks upon him and the way he looks upon General SEWELL, General Black, General McMahon, Colonel Mitchell, General Fessenden, General STEELE, Major Barrett, General Pearson, General Anderson, and Colonel Cooke? Or does the gentleman include them all?

Mr. BLUE. Oh, there is all the difference in the world.

Mr. HILL. Do you include them all in the same category?

Mr. BLUE. By no means. I know General Cooke has found out how villainous this management is, and I know he has no heart in it.

Mr. HILL. And he is the only one you except?

Mr. BLUE. I do not say that. I have not found out about them. I want to say in all candor and in all charity that I am not here to condemn our good friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] except for one reason, and that is his lack of knowledge of this Soldiers' Home. I said awhile ago that what he did not know about it would fill a considerable volume, and I repeat again that the gentleman from Indiana—judging from what I have heard of him on this floor—is gorged with misinformation in regard to them. I do not at this time attack anybody in the management of these Homes except General Franklin, because I am not conversant enough to know about the rest, only thus far, I say that good business men ought not to have permitted this thing to continue without a more thorough investigation.

Mr. RAY. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. BLUE. Yes.

Mr. RAY. How long has General Franklin been the president of that Board of Managers?

Mr. BLUE. Oh, I do not remember. He has been sixteen years on this Board. He has been there a long time—too long.

Mr. RAY. Is he elected by the Managers?

Mr. BLUE. I so understand it. The gentleman will save me time and himself trouble if he will do a little differently than I apprehend the Committee on Military Affairs did—if he will look at this volume, Document No. 288, and in order that he may have ample opportunity to look at it and be fully informed on it in as little time as possible, I will furnish him with an index.

Mr. RAY. I should not understand an index if you gave it to me, but I should like to have the facts appear in your remarks, because it has seemed to me that your attack is as much upon one member of this Board as upon another, and that you can not single out one—

Mr. BLUE. If the gentleman had paid attention to my remarks he would have found out his mistake. One war at a time is enough. I am going at the fountain head of this business, and when the fountain head is changed the source will become pure. These men who are now treated so inhumanly in these Homes will then have an opportunity for decent and fair treatment. I do not care whom you put in General Franklin's place; I do not care whom you put in General Smith's place, so they are honest men that will do their duty and do it fearlessly and uprightly.

Mr. SPERRY. I would ask you if this trouble of which you complain has been brought to the attention of General Franklin?

Mr. BLUE. Oh, yes, my good friend from Connecticut; nobody knows it better than he does. I would like to tell some things on this floor which I would not tell here; but this much I will say: As is said in Governor Anthony's letters, there have been continuous scandals ever since Mr. Smith was appointed, and General Franklin from time to time has had these whitewashing investigations to cover over and smooth down and conceal from view the brutalities and the drunkenness of this Keesley-cure graduate.

Mr. CROWTHER. I would like to ask my colleague a question. How long has this scandal been known to the president of the Board of Managers?

Mr. BLUE. I think from the beginning.

Mr. CROWTHER. How many years?

Mr. BLUE. Some ten or twelve years. I do not know how long the Home has been in operation. I have been informed—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's time be extended.

Mr. HULL. How long?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. For one hour.

Mr. HULL. I will object to an hour.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. For half an hour.

Mr. HULL. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. BLUE. I want to get through.

Mr. HULL. How long will it take you?

Mr. BLUE. I do not know until I get through.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended half an hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLUE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have here another affidavit upon another phase of this matter, and I trust now that the House will give attention to this affidavit, because it shows something of the conditions that exist there and how the law is abused:

THE STATE OF KANSAS, Leavenworth County, ss:

I, Jesse George, of lawful age, being duly sworn, on oath depose and say that I am acquainted with Col. Andrew J. Smith, governor of the Western Branch National Soldiers' Home, Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. That the first time I remember to have met Governor Smith was in the winter of 1893, some time in February or March, when he came into my office to consult with my associate in regard to commencing some prosecutions against some saloon keepers out near the said Home. He was going to begin prosecutions and wanted some legal advice.

About all I remember of him then is that he indulged in considerable profanity and cursed the saloon keepers very freely, and I remember that he stated that he had given two of the "old boys," he called them, thirty days on the dump because they had not knocked one of the keepers down when he had called them "sons of bitches." I manifested some mirth over the statement, and he went on to say that it was his habit to sentence men to the dump for such, and he had about broken up the use of that word at the Home.

Some time in December of 1893 I was called upon to defend an old veteran before Mr. E. B. Wheeler, United States Commissioner at the Home, on a charge of assault with intent to kill. The man I was defending I found had been once dismissed from the Home by Smith, but made complaint to the Board of Managers or to E. N. Morrill, local manager, and had been reinstated. He told me that he had been the victim of Smith's persecution ever since he was reinstated, and finally he had been arrested on the above charge. The evidence developed that the man whom it was claimed the defendant assaulted was a known enemy of the defendant and that he was a vicious fellow, and worse than all, was considerably off in his mind. The testimony showed that the defendant protested to Governor Smith on being put in the same ward with the man and that the governor told him that he would have to stay there; that the governor knew that the complaining witness had it in for the defendant at the time he made the charge. The evidence of the complaining witness himself was to the effect that the defendant's socks stunk that he had under his bunk, and he ordered him to remove them; that he otherwise annoyed him, and he (the complaining witness) assaulted the defendant. He said that the defendant got away once and then he got at him again and clinched him and had him down, and the defendant cut him with a pocket penknife. He was so loony and egotistic that he even went on to say that he could have "licked" the defendant even after he was cut, and would have done it if he had not been pulled off. As to physical, the complaining witness was twice the man the defendant was, and the defendant was an invalid besides. The man was bound over, however, and laid in jail months awaiting trial in the Federal court. My experience and information has been that no one ever fails to be bound over who comes before Wheeler, at Smith's dictation. Wheeler is Smith's private secretary and servile tool to do his bidding.

The reason for his appointment I think can be explained as follows: A short time before his appointment, A. J. Smith, governor aforesaid, was brought before Col. E. M. O. Clough, a United States commissioner, in the city of Leavenworth, on the charge of having tampered with an old veteran's mail. One of the members of the Home was giving some evidence against Smith, and Smith broke out in a "bulldozing" manner upon the witness with, "Now, that is a lie, and you know it." Commissioner Clough told him to desist and not interfere with the witness, and the witness went on; but Smith broke in again in about the same way, and Commissioner Clough told him that he must desist and not interfere with the witness testifying. Smith then said that he was governor of the Home and he did not propose to have any member lie on the stand in that manner. Colonel Clough says he had to admonish him that even if he was governor of the Home he must not interfere with witnesses testifying on the stand, and that if he interfered again he would fine him for contempt. Soon after this Mr. Wheeler was appointed commissioner at the Home. Colonel Clough is a soldier of no mean record and is highly respected in the community. He is United States commissioner here yet, and says hundreds of complaints have come in to him from members of the Home of Smith's outrageous treatment; that he is too old to begin a fight on Smith or he would consider it his duty to do it in the interest of the Home, but if he is called upon to give testimony before any impartial committee he will do it; that from what he knows of Smith he is totally unfitted for the position of governor.

There are instances in which this man Wheeler has used his process to arrest and bring back into the Home man who had been once punished for the same offense by Governor Smith. Notably, one John Walsh, in the month of August last. I saw this man's discharge, with the charge of assault on it, for which he was sentenced to the dump at the Home. And yet he was arrested on a warrant issued by Wheeler for the same offense. The officer serving the warrant told me and told Mr. Dill that all they wanted was to get him back to the Home and fix up matters with him. I might here say that they were at the time refusing to send him his pension papers so that he could draw his money, and also were withholding his discharge at the time the arrest was made; that Walsh refused to go before Wheeler; said that he was not going to the Home to be locked up, but readily consented to go before Commissioner Clough. This was just what Wheeler did not want, and although the orders of the marshal were to take prisoners before the nearest commissioner (and Mr. Clough was the nearest), Mr. Wheeler complained, went down to see Clough the night of the arrest, and even complained to the district attorney about the matter. When it was found that they could not get the old man back into the Home in any way they then sent his pension papers and discharge to him. I saw both the discharge and the warrant and know that the charges on each were the same offense. Walsh was one of the men who would not take the Keesley treatment.

In June, 1894, one William F. Williams came to me with a story of distress and complaint about his treatment at the Home. Said he had been imprisoned in the Home for some weeks; had repeatedly asked for his discharge, and it had been denied him; and he was still limited to the Home grounds; but it had become unbearable, and he had walked out, after trying in vain to get his discharge. The old man had on his uniform, and I told him that I would not write to them nor interfere in his behalf till he turned over everything to the Home that belonged to it; he said he dared not go back, that they would lock him up again if he did. At that time, I regarded Governor Smith as being somewhat reasonable and just, though I knew him to be imperious. I told the old man that if he would take his clothing to the Home and turn it over they would give him his discharge without trouble; that they could not hold his money without cause, and could not lock him up after he had demanded his discharge. The old man was in terror, however, and would not go. He said, however, that he would change his clothes and go with me if I would see that he was protected.

I finally went with him to the Home and direct to Governor Smith's headquarters. The governor was not in, but his adjutant, Hayes, was there, and in answer to my inquiry said he would soon be in. He saw Williams and immediately ordered his arrest. When I saw what they were about I asked Hayes not to send him to jail as they were about to do, but allow him to remain in the office till Governor Smith came, which they did. When the governor came in shortly afterwards he immediately in an angry, blackguard manner assailed Williams, using the following language, as near as I can remember: "Williams, where in the hell have you been, and what do you want here?" The old man quailed before him completely, and stepping before the governor I said, "Governor, he wants his discharge." Smith then turned on me and in the same tone and manner said, "I don't recognize you, sir; Williams is my man, and we can do our business." I told him that I came at Williams's request and his attorney to ask for his discharge, but he said, "I recognize no one to appear for Williams and will not talk with you." I then said, "Mr. Williams, you may tell the governor what you want yourself, since he does not wish me to have anything to do with it." Williams then said, "Yes, Governor, I want my discharge and papers and property." The governor said, "What in the hell would you do with it; would you go away and stay away if you had it?" Williams then said that he would, but the governor, not satisfied, said, "Where would you go to?" And Williams told him he would go to his folks in Missouri. The governor then broke loose again, offsetting it with profanity. "They don't want you; nobody wants you," and then began to abuse the old man again in vile terms, and again told him he could not have his discharge. I then told the governor that the old man wanted his discharge and if there was anything in the way of his having it I would like for him to state what it was. This made him more angry, and turning to Williams he said, "Come in my office, sir." Williams went and I followed to the door. Smith caught the door and began to shut it in my face. I said quietly (as I had talked all of the time), "Governor, now I ask admission into this room as Mr. Williams's attorney; if you refuse me I shall not insist." He said, "I do refuse," and shut the door in my face.

I waited some time in the building, and after a while Williams came out in company with a police officer and was taken to jail. Smith passed me, but said nothing. I went out to the jail and asked the jailer or officer at the jail if Mr. Williams had been locked up there, and he told me it was none of my "damned" business. I went back up toward headquarters and met Smith in his buggy. I hailed him and asked him if I might see Williams as his attorney, and he said yes; if I could find him (this in a very contemptuous manner). I then said, "Governor, I did not come here to interfere with you in any way; if you have any reason or excuse for your treatment of this old man, I am not going to interfere in his behalf; I ask only to be treated courteously in the matter; the old man may be at fault, but you give me no information, and hence I must believe his story. I ask to see him as his attorney. If he is in jail I wish to know it and wish to see him; if he is not, but is at large, I have nothing more to say, but I promised the man he should not be locked up without cause, and I shall in duty to him make my word good." The Governor said, "He is here on the grounds and you can find him."

I went back down to the jail and found out from a man who had not been posted and who knew Williams that he had just been taken and locked up.

I then went back to the city and instituted habeas corpus proceedings the same evening. The United States marshal telephoned the fact to Smith as soon as he got the papers, and Williams was released the same afternoon, given an honorable discharge without a mark against him, given all of his papers, and pension money amounting to something over $50. Smith had become scared and released him probably before the proceedings commenced. The fact that he gave the man an honorable discharge showed to me that his action was only oppression to get the old man to take the Keesley treatment, as he swore to in an affidavit made for the purpose of the proceedings in court.

We went before the court prepared to show that he had been held in duress, but he being then at liberty, the court took my professional statement that he had been restrained without proof. After the proceedings were over Mr. Wheeler, Smith's said secretary, followed the old man around the street and pulled him to one side when with me for a talk, and tried to get him to make an affidavit to the effect that he had not been restrained of his liberty at all. I could hear Williams say to Wheeler, "No; I can't do that. It would be a lie for me to do that. They had me arrested and I could not leave. I was in jail. I can't do that."

and of my own volition I wrote to him a note telling him that I felt that I might have done so, and asking his pardon if I had.

I immediately received a letter from him, in which he imperiously demanded that I publish over my own signature an absolute falsehood in order that he might be vindicated in the Williams case above referred to. The letter threatened me, accused me of libel, and promised to expose and ruin me if I did not accede to his demands.

I felt that I had made a mistake in offering any apology to such a man, even if I had been mistaken, and I wrote and told him so; told him he was at perfect liberty to expose me if he could, and that I had no retraction nor apology to make, and could not make any in the honor of truth. I never heard from him again on the subject, but in the face of these facts and others coming under my observation, I feel perfectly justified in saying that Governor Smith would not hesitate for a moment to threaten and terrorize anyone to vindicate him by falsehood if he dared. I have his letter yet and the copy of my reply.

I have observed that just so soon as any charge is made against Smith he immediately begins to fortify himself, scatter evidence against him, and get evidence together to justify himself.

When there was a publication of some pension investigations by a special examiner sent out by Hon. William Lochren here last winter, there was one man named Crenshaw whose name was unfortunately published in connection with it, who was then at the Home. Smith the next day sent for this old man and examined him, and made him deny everything. I have the affidavit of an eyewitness to the examination who happened to be present. When that fact was published, he sent for the old man and, as I am told, got him to make another statement or affidavit that his former affidavit was not made under duress. I have the statement of Thomas Wilkins to the effect that Governor Smith used like means in his case.

In relation to the Keeley matters at the Home, I would call attention to the fact that Governor Smith is president of the National Keeley League, at, as I am told, a salary of $1,200 a year. I am also told by one who saw the contract, and saw it signed, that for every man who takes the treatment for the liquor habit they pay Dr. Leslie E. Keeley $6. They charge the patient at the Home for the treatment $20, and for certain dues, badges, etc., $2.30 more. The difference between $22.30 and $6 is to be accounted for, and what goes with it has never to my knowledge been satisfactorily answered. Governor Smith has been in absolute control of the fund for some months—yes, years past.

The contract above referred to was signed by Governor E. N. Morrill for the Board of Managers.

Now, whether Governor Smith gets a penny out of the matter or not, he can not, I think, successfully deny that the above is the situation, and the relation he sustains to the Keeley treatment.

Under these circumstances he has a regular system of requiring from every man who takes the treatment an order on his pension money in payment therefor; which amount is withheld from his pension regardless of his wish. The uniform complaint is that he compels men to take the treatment or the gate. I have had, I think, hundreds who have made this charge to me, and United States Commissioner Clough will tell the same story. I do not believe that all of these men tell falsehoods. Some of them say that Governor Smith directly compelled them, but the majority say that he only held the dump and punishment over them till they did take it; that so soon as they took the treatment they were invariably relieved from the punishment and have the governor's favor. Many have been required to take it twice, and even three and four times. I have seen these orders made out by Governor Smith's private secretary, in his handwriting, where on their faces the statement was made, "First treatment, second treatment," etc. Some of these men are: Eli Watkins, who took it twice, and left the Home to keep from taking it again; Richard Wall, John Carrol, Philip Woodward, William F. Williams, Thomas Hughes, John Walsh, Nathaniel J. Holder, Thomas Wilkins, and scores of others. Wilkins took the treatment three times, and has all of his orders to show for it.

The uniform story is that when a man takes the treatment he is admonished that if he ever breaks it he will be put out of the gate, which threat is believed to be by some more efficacious than the treatment itself.

Governor Smith, notwithstanding his connection with the Keeley Club and his having taken the treatment himself, belongs to another club here of a different character. When served with the summons in the Wilkins case he was found in the Leavenworth Club rooms at a game of cards; so while a reformed man he yet has his old haunts. I have seen an affidavit to the effect that he was driven home last February in a state of densely intoxication at 1 o'clock at night.

In the recent Cook-Averill investigation, when things were getting pretty hot for Smith, he took Captain Jacobs out and told him to "think up something or fix up something against Maj. W. B. Shockley," the home treasurer, and said "I want to down that Shockley," which Jacobs refused to do.

I sent in the complaint to Hon. William Lochren on which an investigation was ordered from the Pension Department last winter, and soon after this a libelous communication was sent out from the Home for publication in the Kansas City Star, the Atchison Globe, the Leavenworth Standard, and the Topeka Capital, in vindication of Smith and libeling me. All of the papers cut out the libelous portion except the Topeka Capital, and that paper by inadvertence ran it. I demanded of the paper the name of the correspondent, and found that it had been sent by Mr. E. B. Wheeler, the governor's secretary. I demanded a retraction from Mr. Wheeler, and he gave it. I also asked Governor Smith for a disavowal of his secretary's acts, but have never received one word from him. Mr. Wheeler shouldered the whole responsibility for the publication, but since it published some of the governor's private correspondence, I can not believe he was wholly responsible for it. I believe if he was wholly responsible a statement from Governor Smith to that effect was due me, and a disavowal of his acts was due me also.

Mr. C. L. Knapp, of the firm of Knapp & Bolman of this city, in the earlier history of the Home, during the Weaver investigation, testified before the Board that Smith asked them to cancel his (Smith's) private account with them, out of consideration for the Home trade he (Smith) had given them.

Nathaniel J. Holder will testify that he was compelled by Smith in person to take the Keeley treatment, and promised if he would that he would put him on the pay roll and give him employment; that he was put on the pay roll by Smith and put to attending his (Smith's) cow and chickens and doing light chores about Smith's residence, and for more than a year was in his employment, doing his private work, but was on the pay roll as a stable hand on $7.40 per month pay.

I further state that I verify the above on information and belief, excepting such portions as have come under my observation personally, to which I make positive affidavit.

NATHANIEL J. HOLDER,
Company H, Fifth Regiment Connecticut Infantry.

THE STATE OF KANSAS, Leavenworth County, ss:

I, Nathaniel J. Holder, of lawful age, being first duly sworn, on oath depose and say that I was late of Company H, Fifth Regiment Connecticut Infantry, and that I served two years and four months in the late war; that I have been for two years last past a member of the Western Branch, National Soldiers' Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; that during the said two years I have never been under the influence of liquor to such an extent that I was not able to take care of myself, but that prior to July, 1894, I was arrested by the police of said Home on two different occasions; that the first time I was arrested all the liquor I had drunk was drunk in the beer hall at said Home and was purchased there; that shortly before July 13, 1894, I was again arrested on charge of being absent without leave, was taken before Governor Smith and sentenced by him to do sixty days' work on the dump; that while I was working on the said dump, sanding brick on the pavements at said Home, I was visited by Governor Smith on or about July 11, 1894, and was told by him that if I would call at the office he would put me on the pay roll; that I thought I knew what the governor was after, and that his design was to get me to take the Keeley treatment, so I did not call at his office as he had requested; that the next day the said Governor Andrew J. Smith again called on me while at my work and ordered me to call at his office during that day and he would put me on the pay roll.

That he also on that day urged me to take the Keeley treatment; that I told the said governor then that I was no drunkard, and that I did not need the cure; that the governor said that I did not look like a drinking man, but still insisted on my calling at the office; that I did not go to the office; and on the day following he called again to see me while at work and ordered me to come to his office; that believing that I would have trouble if I did not obey his orders, I went to the governor's office, as he ordered me; that immediately on coming before him he imperiously and threateningly told me that I had a very bad record and that I had better take the Keeley treatment; that I insisted that I did not need it, but on his insisting, and believing and knowing that if I did not take the treatment I would ultimately be discharged from the Home, I finally told him that I had heart disease and rheumatism, and if the treatment would help those diseases I would take it. And I also told him that so far as the drink habit was concerned I had no need of the cure; that I never drank at all except when I was not working and happened to be around where it was, and then I would drink a little much the same as other men; that Smith told me the treatment would help my disease, and that if I would take the treatment so long as he (Smith) was governor of the Home I would have work and be on the pay roll; that Smith took me himself down to the Keeley room and introduced me to the "Keeley boys," and said, "Here is a good man; he is going to take the cure;" that he also introduced me to the doctor, and the doctor examined me and said that I only had slight palpitation of the heart.

That before going down to take the treatment I signed an order for $22.30 on my pension money in payment therefor; that said order on its face only authorized the withholding of $10 from my next installment of pension and the balance was to be withheld from the succeeding installment, but that the whole amount was withheld from my next installment over my own protest; that on taking the Keeley treatment I was immediately relieved from the dump sentence and was put on the pay roll at 40 cents per day as a farm hand; that I kept on at work sanding the brick walks for some days, and then I was sent for by Governor Smith and put to work taking care of his cows and chickens; that I took care of said cows and chickens from the 29th day of August, 1894, until the 6th day of October, 1895; also carrying wood and doing like chores about Governor Smith's house during said time, and all of said time drew $7.50 per month and was on the pay roll of said Home as a stable hand, though I was doing Governor Smith's private work as aforesaid.

That in October I made application for a transfer to the Marion Home, which was refused me, and I was also dropped from the pay rolls.

That soon after this I was put on the Hospital pay roll and worked thirty-five days in the hospital; that after I had quit the hospital on account of not being able to do the work, I was again arrested in my own barracks and taken before the governor on charge of being drunk; that the governor immediately began a tirade of abuse against me, said I was the worst man in the Home, and threatened to have my pension taken away from me; that I said, "Oh, governor, don't do that, I need it." The governor then said he would give me sixty days' dump and sixty days' limits, and told the captain to see that I worked; that I then demanded my discharge from the Home, and told the governor that I had been arrested four times wrongfully on the charge of being drunk; that they had proven nothing against me either time and that I was getting tired of it. I was sent back and put on the dump, and about four days afterwards, in company with four others, I was brought up before the governor and admonished that if I ever violated the Home discipline again I would be turned out of the gate; that I told the governor that I had thought to do my dump duty and get an honorable discharge, but I wished now that he would give me a discharge at once, as I did not care to submit to his treatment any longer. Whereupon he told me to "shut up," but I was so thoroughly indignant that I would not, and told him "that I wanted my discharge, and that I would rather be out and walk the pike and beg for bread than to submit to such abuse; that he knew that I had worked for him fifteen months and had never touched a drop"; that because of this talking back he ordered me back to the guardhouse, where I was kept for an hour or so and again brought up before the said governor to apologize; that I told the governor that there was no insult intended and that I was simply speaking my mind, but was sent back and did the dump duty, and after I had done the dump duty I was reported as having gone in a house that was forbidden on the pike, and was brought up before the governor; that I was not allowed to make any defense, but the governor said to me: "I believe you wanted your discharge a couple of months ago, and at that time I told you that if you violated the discipline again I would give you a dishonorable discharge; I will now give you one"; that he then had Mr. Wheeler to make out a dishonorable discharge for me, and I then left the Home, March 26, 1896.

JESSE GEORGE, Notary Public.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. I would ask the gentleman if he can fix any time within which he can get through?

Mr. BLUE. I think I can finish within another half hour.

Mr. HULL. For I think if you are going to read papers you can read for a week. You have material before you which you can read for a week.

Mr. BLUE. You can not read papers for a week from reputable people on the other side.

Mr. HULL. I would like to get through with the matter today, and let it be voted up or voted down. I ask that the gentleman have another thirty minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to know—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks that the time of the gentleman from Kansas be extended for thirty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the time of the gentleman is extended thirty minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to know if this testimony has been taken with notice to anybody or whether it is ex parte affidavits; and if so, whether they have ever been presented for the consideration of the Managers of the Soldiers' Homes?

Mr. BLUE. Some of them have and some of them have not. They are all ex parte, with the exception of the affidavit of Legate, and in some other instances the Board of Managers have the original papers. In that case he says he gave the testimony before General Averill.

Mr. HULL and Mr. MORSE rose.

Mr. BLUE. I will hear the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HULL. I interrupt the gentleman now, so that while he is on the floor he may notice a point which will undoubtedly be spoken of by other gentleman. Is it not true that the larger part of these charges were investigated, that the citizens of Kansas City came before the investigating board, and that these charges were largely disproved in the investigation?

Mr. BLUE. In reply to that I want to say, and I want the House to understand it, that any investigation ever held by the Board of Managers was a roaring farce, and that no man in that Home would dare to testify against this drunken, brutal governor, who is a graduate of the Keeley cure, without knowing that he would have to take the road as soon as the investigation was over; and I want to say further, that any pretense of giving the men an opportunity to testify, by suspending the governor, never was made. Further, I say that every pretended investigation made there was made, as intimated in Governor Anthony's letter, for the purpose of shielding the governor of the Home as far as possible.

Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BLUE. If you will be right brief, I will.

Mr. MORSE. I will. My question is this: Does not the gentleman from Kansas know that there is a very close connection between the breaking of the rules and the insubordination at that Home and the beer hall and the canteen, and does he not think it would be a pretty good thing to shut up that beer hall?

Mr. BLUE. Yes; and I think it would be a pretty good thing to shut up the mouth of the beer guzzler who presides over it. [Applause.] That is the first step in the business.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to suggest to the Committee on Military Affairs, without any disparagement of any member of it, because I know how these things are done—I want to suggest to that committee, when they put up this man's name here as a candidate for reelection, it is an open secret that it took two efforts to get his name brought in here. I understand that in the caucus which was held to determine the question the first vote taken showed 5 against reelecting him and only 4 in favor of it, and that influences which I will not now mention were used to get some member of the Board to change his mind, so that the candidate was reported back here by a vote of 5 to 4.

Mr. Speaker, I charge that that institution is a private corporation. I charge that it holds property which belongs to the United States in its own name, and buys and sells and traffics and disposes of it at its own sweet will; and if gentlemen will get House Document No. 288 they will find that that is the case. I desire to give the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I will read to the House, an index of that document, which will point out the irregularities that have been practiced and the things that have been done there which ought to condemn and drive from power this man—General Franklin—who holds the first place on the Board, because he manipulates and handles the funds through his man Friday, a man who I verily believe can not give a bond except through a guaranty company.

I am told that the practice is for the Secretary of War to send to these treasurers two forms of bonds, one, the ordinary form, to be signed by private individuals, and the other the form for a guaranty company, so that the treasurer may take his choice. We have been told here by members of the Board that the treasurer is required to pay $500 for his bond obtained from that corporation. I do not know who is behind that, but I am also informed, and I would like the Board to deny it if it is not so, that this same general treasurer demands of the separate Home treasurers, seven in number, that each of them shall give a bond through a guaranty company, at a cost of $100 to each. Is there any arrangement between the general treasurer and this guaranty company by which the $700 thus obtained from the other treasurers enables the company to "ease up" upon his $500?

Those treasurers have in the past been permitted to give bonds as other honorable men generally give them by procuring the signatures of satisfactory individuals, and without incurring other expense than the fees for preparing the bond, but this man Friday of General Franklin's compels the other treasurers to take their bonds from the guaranty company and pay $100 apiece for them. I call attention to that charge. I say further—and I want General Franklin's friends to pay attention to this and correct me if I am wrong—I say that the post buildings on those grounds, if I am not mistaken, constructed out of the funds gathered from the old soldiers, are insured in a company in Hartford, Conn., of which General Franklin is an officer. It has never been the policy of this Government to insure its buildings. It is rich enough to get along without doing that, but for some unaccountable reason these buildings on the Government grounds, which belong to these men, are insured in a company in Hartford, Conn., of which I am told General Franklin is an officer. If that is not true I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. STEELE. I will answer that, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. BLUE. I will not be interrupted now, but I will let you answer it later.

Mr. RAY. I would like to know whether this Board of Managers have power to remove their president.

Mr. BLUE. Oh, this Board of Managers can do anything. The fact is that they have no use for this Government except to have it furnish money. The truth is, as I shall show by this report, that they obey a law when it suits them to do so, and if it does not suit them they disobey it—I do not mean in every instance, but in instances. They can change their governor at their own sweet will.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire the Clerk to read another affidavit, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE STATE OF KANSAS, Leavenworth County, ss:

Jerry Keller, of lawful age, being duly sworn, on oath deposes and says: That from May, 1893, to July, 1895, he was clerk in the office at headquarters at the National Soldiers' Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Leavenworth, Kans.; that among other things he kept the Keeley books and had charge of the Keeley orders taken on veterans' pensions in payment for the Keeley treatment.

That it was his duty when the extra-duty pay roll was paid to go through the pay rolls and orders and make stoppages on the pay roll for the Keeley treatment; that it was also his duty, when the pensions of the veterans were paid, to take all pension-request slips and when pensioners made request for their pension money to examine and make stoppages from their allowances for the payment of any Keeley orders they might have signed; that sometimes the whole amount of the order would be stopped and held out and sometimes only a portion, owing to the amount of pension the pensioner was drawing.

Affiant further says that scores of these men would come to him, inquire about their notes or orders, and ask how much they owed on them; that they would almost invariably "damn" the Keeley treatment, and say, "Here I am having to pay out money for it when it has done me no good." That affiant would say to them, "Why did you take it, then?" And the answer would almost invariably be, "I had to take it or be persecuted and turned out of the gate." Others would say, "I took it to get into the good graces of the old man" or to get a job. That these men frequently complained bitterly of having to pay the money, but affiant had no other option than to withhold it.

JERRY KELLER.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, the undersigned, a notary public in and for the county and State aforesaid, this 31st day of March, 1896.

[SEAL.]

ANNIE M. POUPPERT, Notary Public.

Mr. BLUE. Here is one other affidavit that I would like to have read, and which I send to the desk.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Before that is read I would like to ask this question, whether the gentleman has any expressions from the soldiers who are inmates of the other Homes as to the qualifications of General Franklin—whether they favor him or not?

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF KANSAS, County of Leavenworth, ss:

Personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the aforesaid county and State, James Johnson, a veteran of the late civil war, late of F. the Twenty-eighth Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and whose age is over 61 years, and who, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

That he was admitted to the Western Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, some time in November, A. D. 1890, and while a member of the Home was detailed as sergeant of the police guard at the Home, and while on duty as sergeant of the police guard quite a number of men, eight or ten, came during the cold weather last winter (1893-94), some sick and homeless, footsore and tired, without a cent in their pockets—came for admission to the Home. The affiant, as sergeant of the guard, took or sent these men to the temporary admission barracks to stay over night, and that in the morning these men were taken to the adjutant's office; and affiant further states that sometimes these men were unable to walk to the office and had to be helped to headquarters; and affiant further states that the men would come back and say to him that they could not be admitted as there was no room for them in the Home.

Affiant states that some of these men were taken to the adjutant's office by himself, and that the sergeant had seen their discharge papers from the Army and their pension certificates, and knows that they were regular and just as good papers as he had himself. That this occurred during the months of January, February, and March of 1894, and that at this time there were from fifteen to twenty-five young men, regulars from Forts Leavenworth and Riley, Kansas, a majority of whom had never been in the volunteer service, were there taking the Keeley cure, and occupying beds and places at the general table at the time admission was being refused to the old soldiers described above; and claiming there was no room for them in the Home.

And affiant further states that he took two of these men to the depot to leave the Home that were partly unable to walk, and that they complained to him that they had no money to buy anything to eat and no place to sleep or stay at night, and that affiant gave one of them 50 cents; and affiant further states that he was never before Governor Smith for any offense whatever, but that he was once reprimanded by Governor Smith for calling an old soldier a gentleman. That he took an old veteran before the governor under arrest, as directed by the governor, and said to the governor, "This is the old gentleman, Governor." The governor said, "Don't call that man a gentleman; he's a scoundrel;" and further affiant saith not.

JAMES JOHNSON.

Sworn and subscribed before me this the 27th day of November, A. D. 1894; and I certify that the affiant is reputable and entitled to credit.

[SEAL.]

J. H. GRANGER, Notary Public

[The original of this affidavit is in the hands of the Board of Managers.]

Mr. BLUE. Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). Fourteen minutes.

Mr. BLUE. I do not like to stop until I get through, but the chairman of this committee [Mr. HULL] seems very anxious about this matter. I hope the House will accord me an opportunity when the time comes to close this debate, because I have studied this question considerably. Trusting that I may have the opportunity to be heard when gentlemen on the other side have spoken, I will now, with a few words further, close what I have to say.

In this connection I wish to state that the last affidavit read shows that there were from fifteen to twenty-five young men of the Regular Army in this Soldiers' Home, receiving the Keeley treatment, while old "comrades" of the war—foot-sore, weary, hungry—have been driven away from the Home with the statement that there was no room for them, and this in the winter time, too. I challenge the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to that fact. If he has any doubt about it, I think I can convince him the statement is true.

Mr. HULL. What is the charge—that a large number of men of the Regular Army are accommodated at the Home?

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir; soldiers from Fort Riley and other places who are undergoing the Keeley treatment for the profit of Smith and his confederates. Where does this $20 go? It goes into the Keeley fund. Who has ever made any investigation as to how that Keeley fund is spent? Nobody but the men who are concerned in it. Does not General Franklin know, does not the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] know, that this infamous Keeley cure is practiced in practically every Soldiers' Home? Do they not know that at practically every Home there is a beer saloon making profit for the man in charge of the post? Does not the gentleman from Indiana know that the Board has assigned civil officers as guards about the Home in his own State? Does he not know that in violation of the contract this Board provided for the leasing or purchasing of additional ground in order to obtain natural gas? My understanding is that under the contract citizens were to furnish that gas; but it seems that for some reason or other they did not furnish a sufficient quantity, and an additional plot of ground was purchased to be paid for by the Government.

Does not the gentleman know all these things? If he does not, then it is time that he should be looking up this matter. Does he not know that the report of the Inspector-General shows that the persons in control of this Home have forced balances in their accounts? Does he not know that the report of the Inspector-General shows—I am not speaking now upon the authority of any affidavit—that some of the funds belonging to this corporation, the Soldiers' Home, are kept in banks which are not public depositories?

If the gentleman does not know these things which I have stated, I call his attention to them and to the further fact that during one year of the management of this institution, with this man at the head, about a quarter of a million dollars' worth of the public property belonging to the Home was condemned or destroyed. Members of this Board came before the Committee on Appropriations and asked of the Government that they be permitted to buy supplies in an aggregate quantity for a considerable time ahead for the use of the Home, pretending that this was the better policy. I have had occasion to look into this matter, and I find that such is not the practice of the Army. Has somebody got a job in reserve to profit by such an arrangement? The practice of the Army, as I understand, is to buy the supplies as near the post as they can be bought expeditiously and cheaply. Why do they want to buy all the supplies of one particular kind at one place? I call the gentleman's attention to that. Is any of the Board of Managers or his friends interested in a contract of that kind?

I call the gentleman's attention also to the fact that this Board of Managers took a trip to the Santa Monica Home—a portion of them at least did—at an expense of $6,000, the ostensible purpose being to look into the business of the Home at that place. They took, it seems, a palace car with a buffet or dining car. I do not know how many ladies formed a part of the party, but the railroad company required that at least 15 tickets be purchased. And when these men got through with their business at Santa Monica they discovered that the nearest way back was by San Francisco and Portland, Oreg.! I have here and shall take occasion to present some items of some of the expenditures of these luxuriant gentlemen. They came around back in that way, the trip costing $6,000 and upward. One hundred and fifty-seven dollars was for servant hire. I am told that in some of their bills are charges for gratuities for servants; in others, charges for neckties! My colleague alongside of me says that the statement also contains a laundry bill or two. I believe also there are charges for cleaning clothes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I say that this private corporation, holding property which rightfully belongs to the Government—a private corporation which costs the Government about $2,500,000 a year—stands above the Government. It has resisted, I understand, every effort of the Congress of the United States to control it. I myself have been assured by a member of this Board of Managers, who is also a United States Senator, that I could not defeat this man Franklin; that the Senate would see to it that he was not defeated; and that statement was made in the presence of my colleague from Missouri.

I understand that behind this octopus whose tentacles reach to every part of this Government, every sycophant, every understrapper, is called upon to stand by this man Franklin for fear of losing his place. I have been informed, and I believe that even the good governor of the Home at Dayton, Ohio, the State represented in part by my friend on the right here [Mr. GROSVENOR], has been known to have telegraphed here to friends to see to it that General Franklin was not defeated.

I say to you, and I say here in the face of the country, that General Franklin in this matter is either grossly negligent, grossly incompetent, or he is not honest. And I say further to you that the Soldiers' Homes have no better friend than I am. I believe in the great charity, and I do not propose, when the time comes for you to answer here, to be charged with being an enemy of the Homes. I am friendly to them, and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I did not object to a single item that went into their bill. I am here to vote the last dollar necessary for the proper support of the soldiers of this great nation, but I am here to say to the friends of Mr. Franklin and to the friends of that graduate of the Keeley institute at Leavenworth who is his tool that as long as I stand in my place on the floor of this House I propose to defend my old comrades against the brutality and cruelty of this wretched and contemptible man. [Applause.]

I want to reserve the balance of my time. I ask now to make a part of my remarks this statement of the expenditures of this luxurious octopus in its travels to the West, and also this index to the report of the Inspector-General of the Army.

The table of expenditures is as follows:

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will take the question before it under careful deliberation and decide according to its merits.

We have had an arraignment of the Soldiers' Homes by a Representative from the State of Kansas [Mr. BLUE], within the limits of which State one of these Homes is located. He arraigned the governor of the Leavenworth Home and indirectly the president of the Board of Managers, which consists of eleven persons elected by Congress in open session. In the enactment of the bill establishing these Homes it was provided that the Board of Managers should be selected with the dignity and consideration given to the election of the President of the United States when that question comes before the House for determination, and it becomes us to carefully consider every accusation made against those who are responsible for the management of these Homes, as it would if the conduct of the President of the United States himself were under consideration for official misconduct.

I come to the support of this question as that member of the majority of the Military Committee who resides nearest to New England. From that section Congress has, from the establishment of these Homes, selected two members. The State of Maine has had a representative in the person of General Fessenden, who has declined to serve longer, and the Military Committee have named another citizen of that State to take his place.

Gen. William B. Franklin, who has served a long time upon this Board, has been renominated by the Military Committee, acting, as I believe, in accord with the sentiments of the people of New England and all persons acquainted with his efficient services.

General Franklin has been attacked indirectly by charges which have been made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] respecting the conduct of the governor of the Home at Leavenworth. These charges are old. They have been investigated, and I regret that the report of the officer making the investigation has not been published and laid upon the desks of members. I have the report of the investigation on my desk.

The arraignment made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] is worthy of little consideration both as to the matter and the method of its procurement, which was ex parte and is entirely irrelevant to the question before the House.

Mr. STEELE. May I ask you right there if Colonel Cooke, the member of the Board from Kansas, was not present when that investigation was had?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I will endeavor to answer that as I proceed. I trust that I may be allowed to proceed without interruption. I intend to answer, as well as I may, the charges of the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], and to put forth some general facts which have not been alluded to by him.

The numerous affidavits which the gentleman from Kansas has read to establish a case against the governor of the Leavenworth Home, as was suggested by the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], are ex parte, obtained without notice to any member of the Board, and do not bear that stamp of regularity required in courts of justice as do those which I propose to bring to the attention of the House.

This question comes before the House on the report of the Committee on Military Affairs to fill the vacancies in the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes. My friend from Kansas moves to amend that report by striking out the name of the gentleman first named in it, Gen. William B. Franklin, and substituting that of Gen. Oliver O. Howard. The Military Committee have in their report selected a representative from the State of Maine, which is the home of General Howard, and it would be an innovation to select two from the same State.

Mr. BLUE. Will you permit me to correct you? You are mistaken. General Howard lives in Vermont, as the gentleman from Vermont will tell you.

Mr. HULL. That is true. General Howard lives at Burlington, Vt.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. That is a fact I did not know.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that General Howard is a native of Maine, but his present residence is Vermont.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I accept the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], and that of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. General Howard is an officer of the United States Army on the retired list; and it has not been the custom of Congress to put officers on the retired list upon this Board, and I doubt very much if it would be regarded as judicious to do so now.

Mr. BLUE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No; I must decline. You have had two hours, and after I have spoken half that time I will endeavor to answer any question you may desire to ask.

As to General Howard, I have nothing but praise to utter. The question is whether General Franklin should be reelected to the position he has so long and ably occupied. It is charged that he constitutes the Board; that its soul, as we are to understand from our friend [Mr. BLUE], rests within the breast of General Franklin. If this be so, it is because the other members of the Board have such confidence in his ability that they trust him to a greater extent than they would if he were less competent. That he is a man of superior ability and character, and that they may trust him, goes without question wherever General Franklin is known.

The difficulty at Leavenworth arises upon charges of an ex-surgeon of the Home, by the name of Weaver. Let us consider official evidence, and not that which is mere hearsay. Dr. Weaver's communication containing charges was addressed to General Black, a member of the Board, and other communications of like character were addressed to Governor Glick, the United States pension agent of Kansas. General Averill, the inspector of the Homes, was ordered to go there and make an investigation of the complaints. Colonel Cooke, of Kansas, the member of the Board of Managers, has supervision of that Home in all matters of general policy and supervises the conduct of the governor. When Colonel Cooke and General Averill began the investigation, they invited the members of the body known as the "Keesley contingent" or "Legion" to come into their presence and state if either of them had ever been forced to take the Keesley cure, or if either of them knew of any other member of the Home who had been forced to take it; and no one replied.

They were then informed that they could come privately to Colonel Cooke or to General Averill, as they saw fit, and make a statement, if they had the slightest fear that their testimony would cause them to suffer, and none came. Dr. Weaver was summoned and given an opportunity to establish his accusations, made on personal knowledge and by hearsay. Every person he referred to was summoned and examined. The people of Leavenworth came and repudiated the various charges. From the hurried examination I have been able to give to the testimony, none of the charges made by Dr. Weaver were sustained. I will now read the testimony of ex-Senator Alexander Caldwell and other prominent citizens of Leavenworth:

AT THE NATIONAL HOTEL,
Leavenworth, Kans., October 11, 1894.

At the National Hotel, city of Leavenworth, a body of the leading citizens called upon the assistant inspector general in the afternoon, and Mr. Alexander Caldwell, speaking for them, said in reply to inquiries:

Q. How long have you resided here, Mr. Caldwell?

A. Since 1861.

Q. What is your business or occupation?

A. My own business is manufacturing and farming.

Q. Are you well acquainted with the citizens of this town?

A. Yes, sir; I am very well acquainted with them.

Q. Will you please state the object of your visit here?

A. The object of our visit here is to answer such inquiries as you might choose to make of the citizens of Leavenworth in regard to this investigation, to give our testimony, if you want it, in regard to the Home and in regard to Governor Smith, knowing that he is under investigation, and submit this paper, which I hand you. That paper is signed by fifty of the representative men of the town. The mayor is present, and the chairman of the board of county commissioners, and the remainder of the gentlemen are representative men, and the men in the other room are alike representative men.

[Paper submitted, addressed to the Board of Managers of the National Home, and marked "Exhibit M."]

Q. Mr. Caldwell, have you had an opportunity to observe the character of the management of the Western Branch of the National Home since its establishment here?

A. I have been at the Home frequently and have seen Governor Smith frequently. I have therefore taken a great interest in the welfare of the Home, and while I am not familiar with all the details of the management, and could not be expected to be unless I was on the inside and had had access to the books and accounts, yet I think I know something of the general management of the Home and of the conduct of Governor Smith in connection with the Home.

Q. Will you please state the result of your observations since the establishment of the Home regarding the conduct of the members who have visited the city?

A. I will say this, that immediately after, and for a good while after, the establishment of the Home it had been to some extent an association of drunkards. It was a rare thing that we could drive as far south as the Soldiers' Home and back without meeting from one to a dozen drunken members of the Home along the public road who were offensive, and some times very abusive, but since the introduction of the Keeley Institute, and for the last year or more, we have not seen anything of that kind; there has been a great reformation in that respect. Yesterday I drove to the penitentiary, and while I passed a dozen of old soldiers, and a good many dozen of them, I did not see one that was intoxicated or that I thought had been drinking, so that now it is possible for the people of Leavenworth to go in that direction without being offended by drunken soldiers, and for that the people of Leavenworth feel very kindly toward Governor Smith. They know that this reformation has been entirely due to his ability and to his courage, and for that they are very grateful to him. They think that he has not only benefited the Home and the old soldiers, but also the city of Leavenworth, for which every man, woman, and child in the town feels thankful. He has been enthusiastic and persistent in that work, and I think he has accomplished more than any other man could have accomplished, because he was peculiarly well fitted to accomplish a work of that kind.

Q. Are you acquainted with Governor Smith personally?

A. Yes, sir; I have known Governor Smith from the first day he arrived here to take charge of the establishment of the Home. I was one of a committee of four—General Smith, General Colbur, and George T. Anthony. Our committee arranged for the securing of the grounds for the Soldiers' Home and carrying out all the details of the matter, and I was necessarily familiar with the board at that time, and saw a great deal of Governor Smith.

Q. And your interest in the Home has been naturally more lively than that of any citizen who was not so early engaged in its establishment as you were?

A. Yes, sir; for this reason, that the city donated $50,000 in cash, or agreed to, and also purchased and got 600 acres of ground equal to the purpose for which it was desired. We, the members of the committee, took the responsibility upon ourselves personally to accomplish that, and then by personal solicitation on the streets we raised the money necessary to accomplish that. In doing that we had the promise that the Home would be an advantage to our city, besides being a proper institution to establish of the Soldiers' Home, and I was necessarily exceedingly anxious that in all respects the Home should be a success, that the people of Leavenworth might not regret what they had done, so I have taken a deep interest in the Home, and I am a friend of the Home.

Q. Have your observations of the management of the Home, or of the governor of it, disclosed anything that would be obnoxious to the sentiment of the good citizens of Leavenworth since May, 1893?

A. I have not seen anything of the conduct of the governor that would be obnoxious, but, on the contrary, everything that is commendable.

Q. Do you believe that you represent the sentiments of these fifty gentlemen in making it that general?

A. I feel quite sure I do. I don't know that I put it strong enough. I could not feel more intensely on the subject than I do.

Q. Mr. Caldwell, you and all the gentlemen for whom you are speaking are undoubtedly aware that certain charges have been made regarding the management of the Home and implicating its governor. I ask you to state freely and frankly if you know of any incidents or facts that would implicate the governor in any misconduct since May, 1893?

A. I do not, General. If I did, I would frankly state it to you. I do not know of a thing.

Q. Do you know of any gentleman among those you represent who would be likely to know anything that would be obnoxious to the rules and regulations governing the Home?

A. No, sir; I do not have in mind any gentleman who knows of any charge such as you refer to at all; I do not.

Q. How long have you been aware of the fact that an investigation was to take place?

A. I learned of this investigation about ten days ago.

Q. Can you state, or is it within your knowledge, what is the source of these charges indicated?

A. I do not know of anybody in the city that would make charges of that kind, and am forced to the conclusion that they must emanate from officers or somebody connected with the Home. I have heard on the street that Major Shockley and Dr. Weaver were interested in pushing these charges, but I do not know that this is a fact, but I believe so.

Mr. Samuel Dodsworth, mayor, city of Leavenworth, in reply to inquiries said:

Q. Mr. Dodsworth, how long have you resided in this city?

A. Since 1858.

Q. And you know the sentiments of its citizens upon almost all subjects?

A. Yes, sir; partly.

Q. All public matters?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you acquainted with Governor Smith?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you known him?

A. Since his assignment to the Home.

Q. Have you been cognizant as to the character of his management and the reforms he has undertaken to introduce and carry out?

A. Yes, sir; as far as anyone not connected with the Home could be.

Q. How have they affected the town?

A. In what respect, General?

Q. In respect to its temperance and intemperance, and general moral aspects on the streets?

A. In my judgment, the management of Governor Smith in that respect has been such as to be highly commended by this entire community in relation to his management in endeavoring to reform men who needed reform.

Q. What has been its effect upon the saloons in the city?

A. My own personal judgment is that it has been beneficial. I would state, to my notion, our saloon men, or men who are engaged in the liquor business, are men who are looked upon well in society and business circles, and are men who would not encourage men to drink to excess. My knowledge has been of the liquor traffic, concerning a majority of the men that are engaged in the business, are men who are good citizens, are men who, to my present belief, would assist a movement of that kind, instead of encouraging it the other way.

Q. Do you think the saloon keepers in the city—the respectable ones—desire the class of customers which the Home provided when the men were unrestrained?

A. I think not; no, sir. I do not think they desired that class of trade.

Mr. F. G. Markart, in reply to inquiries, said:

Q. How long have you resided here?

A. Fifteen years.

Q. Do you occupy any official position?

A. I do not now. I was police commissioner about two years ago for a year and a half. I have been post commander of Custer Post here for a number of years, and have been well acquainted with the status of the behavior and sobriety of the men, and at the same time have been doing quite an amount of business with the Home, going back and forth for five or six years, and I find a most wonderful improvement, since the Keeley cure started, in the status of the men. During my term as police commissioner I have had to go up there time and again, two or three times a week, to the city jail and turn out from there from five to fifteen members who had been put in there during the night, which I believe is almost entirely done away with now. I am personally acquainted with a number of members of the Home, those who have taken the Keeley cure. I have found some of those that were worthless and every time that they could get out of the Home would get in jail have now turned out to be good workmen.

Q. Do you know of anything, or is there anything within your knowledge, which would sustain a charge of mismanagement of the Home or misconduct of the governor?

A. Not a thing.

Mr. J. W. Crancer said:

I have been here thirty-six years in the hardware business, on the corner of Third and Delaware streets for the last ten years. I was there before there was any Home. Before there was any Keeley institute at the Home we had great opportunity of observing the old soldiers coming from the Home on the cars as they got off at our corner and got on to go back to the Home. The dummy line at that time was the only conveyance to the Home—steam dummy. In those days the old soldiers would come in, and there was not scarcely any day or any part of the day that we would not see from one to half a dozen old soldiers, some drunk, and some so drunk that they rolled in the gutters. That was a daily occurrence. Since the Keeley institute went into operation at the Home we have seen but very little of that kind of drunkenness; in fact, it is a rare case now to see one that is intoxicated, and it has been quite a relief to the people around in that vicinity, and now we are glad to see the old veteran, whereas before, we were disgusted at the sight of him on account of their conduct.

Q. Is it within your knowledge or observation that there has been any mismanagement of the Home, or misconduct of the governor, since May, 1893?

A. I know nothing of any misconduct on the part of the governor, nor have I heard from any respectable source that there was any complaint with his management whatever.

Q. Do you know of any person who professes to have knowledge of any mismanagement or misconduct?

A. If I do they have never repeated it to me.

Q. Have you heard any public rumors of charges against the governor of the Home?

A. I have heard rumors that there were charges. I have not only heard that there were charges against the governor, but, on the other hand, I have heard that the governor had preferred charges against others; so I don't know.

Q. Do you know anything of the source of any charges against the Governor?

A. I do not know; but, to the best of my belief, they come from some of the officers in the Home, and also assisted by another party or parties on the outside.

Q. Can you state the grounds for your belief?

A. The grounds for my belief are for the simple reason that there has been an investigation heretofore, and the surgeon, Dr. Weaver, lost his place as a result, and there are some of the officers—Major Shockley I have heard is one—who are assisted by parties on the outside. That is my belief.

Mr. John Hannon said:

I have resided in Leavenworth seven years. At present I am engaged in the real estate business.

Q. Do you occupy any official position?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is that?
 A. I am a member of the board of county commissioners. I am its chairman.

Q. Are you acquainted with Governor Andrew J. Smith, of the Home?
 A. Yes, sir.

Q. During the last year and a half, what have you noted with regard to his administration, or with regard to his character, manner, and language?
 A. Since my first acquaintance with him I have had some official and personal business with him, and my observations of his conduct are that he has always shown himself as a gentleman and his conduct both at the Home and in the city has been exceptionally good. I have been at the Home, as I have stated, on official business quite frequently by reason of the position I hold as Commissioner—I am also commissioner for the poor—and in that capacity I have had a good deal of dealing with the governor.

Q. What have you noted in regard to the management of the Home?
 A. I think it has been exceptionally good. I have been at Milwaukee and I have had some observations from there, and I do not think the management of the Leavenworth Home could be improved upon.

Q. What is your age?

Q. You have heard what these other gentlemen have said with regard to the improvement in the conduct of the members of the Home as to their temperance and intemperance; does your observation coincide with theirs?
 A. Yes, sir; I think I am, perhaps, more familiar with the majority of the members of the Home who visited the city prior to the institution of the Keeley League, and subsequently, than any other citizen in the county. When an old soldier has no place to go to and is eligible to the Home, coming from all parts of the country for admission without proper papers and without any money, and at all seasons of the year, everybody directs them to the commissioner for the poor. I have never appealed to Governor Smith for the admission of such persons, when at times he was crowded and not permitted to take anybody in, but what my appeal was always acceded to. I have taken men from the city down there in my own conveyance, soldiers that have come here for admission to the Home without proper papers, and in no instance has the governor refused to provide for them either at the Home or in the city. There are quite a number of soldiers that have families that come to the Home, and acquire them after they come here—that is, quite frequently. Some of those people living with their families in the city, of course, are sometimes in considerable distress through shortness of means, as frequently they died in the city, and in no instance, on my application, has the governor refused to furnish them a burial, and in many instances has cared for the family as much as he could. Now, prior to the institution of the Keeley League there a good many soldiers were deterred from getting back to the Home, and of course that was of frequent occurrence; and having somewhat to do with the public highway to the Home, I have often had my attention called to the drunkenness and disorderly conduct of the members of the Home along the public road. They were lying along side the road in ones, twos, and by the dozens from here to the Home. Now, since the institution of the Keeley League, a drunken man between here and the Home is a rare thing, or in the city.

Q. Have you seen anything during the last year and a half in the conduct of the governor of the Home that would sustain the charge of mismanagement or misconduct on the part of the governor?
 A. There could be no foundation for such a charge from my observations, and I think I see the governor here and at the Home two or three or four times a week.

Q. Do your duties as commissioner of poor lead you to frequent interviews with him?
 A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have heard something of charges being preferred against the governor?
 A. Yes, sir; a member of the Home came to me first, about a year ago last July, whose name I do not now recollect, and stated that he was a captain of a company down there and wanted me to sign and forward some charges against the governor. He stated he was a cousin of Congressman Carruth of Kentucky, and that they would be in position now—that Mr. Carruth would take up the charges, and that they would be forwarded through him.

Q. Through Mr. Carruth?
 A. Yes, sir; and he said if I would go to the office of Dr. Weaver I could learn more about the charges. I said to the member that I did not agree with him in anything he had said about the governor, as I was frequently at the Home and the statements that he had made I knew to be entirely false; and I said to him that I had supposed that they were satisfied in the last investigation they had made, and that those charges ought not now to be carried any further. He replied to that by saying that it was a Democratic Congress now, and that there was going to be a Democratic management, and that they were going to have him out.

Q. What was the date that this man presented these charges to you?
 A. I think it was about the middle of July, 1893. Of this occurrence I have never spoken to anybody before.

Q. Did you go to see Dr. Weaver, as he asked?
 A. No, sir; I have never been in Dr. Weaver's office that I know of. I want to say this, that I am personally acquainted with a great many members of the Home and that I have never heard one, whose conduct was good and who was a sober man, but what spoke in the highest commendation of the governor; in fact, I had a little knockdown in my office one day between two of the members of the Home. One spoke disparagingly of the governor in regard to his treatment of the old soldiers, and the other member said, "You are a villainous old liar, and I will hear no man talk about the governor in that way; he is as good a man as ever lived," and then they went at it.

Mr. Henry Ettenson, in reply to inquiries, said:
 Q. How long have you resided in Leavenworth?
 A. Since 1868—twenty-six years.

Q. What is your business?
 A. General merchandise department store.

Q. Are you acquainted with Governor Smith?
 A. I am, sir.

Q. Have you heard something of charges being preferred against him?
 A. Yes, sir.

Q. Please state what you know with regard to these charges.
 A. Well, I have been away from home for six weeks. On my return home I was quite busy, and I was walking down the street from my business and Mr. Carl Hoffman met me and said to me, "Have you heard about the charges that have been preferred against Governor Smith," and I was greatly astonished at his remarks, and I told him I did not see what charges they could prefer against Governor Smith, as I did not think they could find a better man to manage the Home anywhere, which I have heard a good many Eastern people speak of in different ways. Sometimes people from the East come out here and I take them out to the Home every six months, when they come from time to time, and they can see the improvement it has made, and especially so in the last year. When I heard they were going to have an investigation I said to Mr. Hoffman: "Wouldn't it be a good idea to get up a petition to the Board and ask them not to believe in those charges, and investigate and ask the business people of the city?" I signed the petition, and after I signed the petition Dr. Weaver called and he said to me: "Mr. Ettenson, I have heard that you have signed a petition to the Board in favor of Governor Smith." I told him I did, and that I did not think there was anything wrong about it, and that I did not think we could find a better man than Governor Smith, and that every citizen in Leavenworth was well satisfied with Governor Smith. Then another gentleman approached me and said, "Don't you know that Major Shockley is purchasing agent out there?" and I said to him, "What of it—what if he is? It don't make any difference to me." I was busy and didn't have any further conversation with the gentleman. Now I will tell you my experience in regard to the Home since the Keeley institute started there, and before. Before the Keeley institute was there it was very seldom that we ever did any business with the old veterans, because they had no money; but since the Keeley institute has been out there we find that the trade from those veterans has increased considerably. They come in and buy dry goods for their friends, wives, and children, and some have been coming in and buying suits of clothes. Why, the trade has increased wonderfully since that Keeley institute has started up out there.

Q. Referring again to your conversation with Dr. Weaver, was that all he said to you?

A. That is all, because I had no time to stand and talk with him. I was just going to purchase a stock of goods; it was on Saturday, about 5 minutes before 10 o'clock, and the sale commenced at 10 o'clock, and I rushed away. He was astonished that I should take a hand in this business. He did not want me to come up here in behalf of Governor Smith.

Q. When did he say that to you?

A. On Saturday morning, a little before 10 o'clock.

Q. Whereabouts?

A. On the corner of Fourth and Delaware.

Q. How did he know that you were coming here?

A. Because we circulated a petition Friday.

Mr. Harvey D. Bush said:

I have lived in Leavenworth nearly thirty-eight years; I am 66 years old, and I have been in business continuously during the time I have lived here.

Q. Are you acquainted with Governor Smith?

A. Very well, indeed.

Q. How long have you known him?

A. Since the Home was established here.

Q. Have you visited the Home frequently?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have your relations been intimate with the governor?

A. Not especially so; though I have visited his house a few times.

Q. Have you had a good opportunity to observe the management of the Home, the discipline of its members, and the conduct of the governor?

A. I think I have; yes, sir.

Q. Have you noticed anything in the management of the Home which would suggest mismanagement to your mind?

A. I have not.

Q. Have you seen anything in the conduct of the governor during the last year and a half that you could criticize?

A. Not a thing.

Q. Will you please state what have been your general or particular observations of him with regard to his management as governor and with regard to his conduct?

A. Since the establishment of the Keeley cure at the Home by Governor Smith the conduct of the members has been good. They come to town and go away sober, as a rule; previous to that, when they visited our town it was the exception when they went home sober. I will say in reference to the conduct of the governor, that I have seen nothing out of the way whatever during the last several years, since he took the Keeley cure himself. In fact, he is certainly a large-hearted man, and I have heard, I think I am safe to say, fully a hundred men, members of the Home, express themselves decidedly in his favor and as being well satisfied with his treatment of them.

Q. Are you in position to know the public sentiment of this town on any important topic?

A. I believe that I am.

Q. Do you know of any public sentiment here that is antagonistic to the management of the Home and to its governor?

A. Well, I think, without a single exception, I have not heard the governor spoken of derogatorily in the last three or four or five years, except by one gentleman called Dr. Weaver. I think there is a universal sentiment in favor of Governor Smith. It is not because he treats with this man, that man, or the other; it is because the people actually love Governor Smith. They think he is a big-hearted man, and the man for the position. It was only recently that I heard of these charges, and I was greatly surprised.

Mr. W. N. Todd said:

I have resided here since 1857; am 43 years old; have known the governor ever since he has been located here, and am familiar with the management of the Home, and only within the past few days heard of any charges being preferred. As regards the conduct of the members of the Home, I think I am in a position to speak knowingly and satisfactorily. I live on the main road leading from the city to the Home, and prior to the establishment of the Keeley cure my family were frequently annoyed by intoxicated members of the Home stopping at my house, ringing the doorbell, knocking at the door, and otherwise annoying the members of my family; have frequently had them come into my yard, take a bottle of whiskey from their pockets and drink the contents, two or three of them at a time. My family have a sewing room looking out on the yard, and my little children would often tell me of old soldiers being in there drinking whiskey, and would frequently show me bottles that they had thrown away in the yard. Learning of these charges, and that they had some relation to the Keeley cure, I took occasion to ask my folks if in the last year or year and a half they had been annoyed in this same manner, and they assured me that they had not—had not, either by the ringing of the door bell or annoyance in any manner whatever, and that they passed by in a sober and in a decent manner.

Q. According to your observations, has the experience of all the citizens been similar to yours?

A. It has, wherever I have had occasion to speak of it; the experience of one is the same as that of another. I would like to say in this connection that at my place of business we were frequently annoyed by two or three drunken soldiers coming in and begging for this thing and that thing.

Q. Have you been annoyed in that way during the last year and a half?

A. Not in a single instance. I think that the establishment of the Keeley cure has been one of the most beneficial results that was ever undertaken, and it has brought up the morals of the men, as well as satisfied the community, the citizens of Leavenworth, and whereas the old soldiers were once a nuisance and a burden, they are now a source of pleasure to the people, and I believe it all comes from the Keeley cure, every bit of it.

Q. Are you in a position to know the general sentiment of this community with regard to the management of the Home and the conduct of the governor during the last year and a half?

A. Yes, sir; I am.

Q. What is that sentiment?

A. The sentiment is universally in favor of the governor, both as to his social and business relations, and the management of the Home is commended by all citizens, irrespective of class.

Q. Can you account for anything within your own knowledge why charges have been made against the governor which have led to this investigation?

A. I believe it is pure jealousy.

Mr. James A. McDonigle said: I have resided here since May, 1897; my age is 60.

Q. What is your occupation?

A. Contractor and builder.

Q. What important work have you done in building during the last ten years?

A. I built the Kansas City Union Depot, Atchison Union Depot, Buffalo Union Depot, Denver Union Depot, Burlington depot over in Iowa, general office building of the Santa Fe Railroad, Montezuma Hotel at the Las Vegas Hot Springs, N. Mex., and also a portion of the statehouse of Kansas, and a number of insane asylums in Kansas and Nebraska, a college building in Omaha, and Machinery Hall and other buildings at the World's Fair, and most of the buildings at the Soldiers' Home.

Q. Are you well acquainted in this city?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Know the sentiment of its people?

A. I believe I do.

Q. Are you acquainted with Governor Smith?

A. I am.

Q. How long have you known him?

A. Since the commencement of the construction of the Home.

Q. Since May, 1893, have you had good opportunities for observing the management of the Home, the appearance of its members; have you noted their comfort or discomfort, their discipline, their behavior as to temperance or intemperance, and the conduct of the Governor?

A. Well, I think the management of the Home on the part of the Governor is good; as far as I can see the discipline of the men is satisfactory, and I am satisfied, from my knowledge of the past and what I have seen recently, that the discipline and the actions of the members of the Home are far superior to what they were two years ago or more.

Q. You have been engaged in putting two and two together for many years; can you account for these charges against the governor from anything within your own knowledge?

A. No; I can not.

Q. Do you know anybody that can?

A. No, sir.

Mr. J. W. Spratley said:

I have resided here thirty-eight years; am 60 years of age; am in the banking business—president of the Union Savings Bank.

Q. Have you been a visitor at the Soldiers' Home?

A. Yes, sir; frequently.

Q. Are you acquainted with the governor?

A. Ever since he has been here, I believe.

Q. Have you had frequent opportunities for observing the management, discipline, and conduct of the members of the Home?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What has it been since May, 1893?

A. Since May, 1893, or since the Keeley institution was established, we have noticed a great change in the old soldiers. It has been improving all the time, and from then up to the present time it has been a pleasure for me to take anyone out to the Home. Before that time I felt a little delicacy in taking my family down to the Home, but now I am very proud to take anyone down there, there has been such a marked change.

Q. Do you know Governor Smith well?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you observed anything in his conduct during the last year and a half that you could criticize?

A. No, sir; not a thing; it has been commendable in every respect.

Q. Are you pretty well acquainted with the sentiments of the people of this town?

A. Yes, sir; I think I am.

Q. Do you think they agree with the sentiments you have expressed with regard to the management of the Home and the conduct of the governor?

A. Yes, sir; I think it is universal.

Q. And you are in a position to know?

A. Yes, sir; I think so. I come in contact with all classes of citizens.

Mr. O. B. Taylor said:

I have resided here thirty-five years. At the present time I am out of business. With the exception of the last three years I have been in the wholesale grocery business.

Q. Are you acquainted with a man named McLouth?

A. I am not.

Q. Are you acquainted with a man by the name of Lilley?

A. Yes, sir; very slightly.

Q. What is Mr. Lilley's standing in this community?

A. Not being acquainted with his associates I am unable to say as to his standing among them. From his general appearance I should say that he was an entirely worthless character. I have been solicited and have contributed money to keep him from starving.

Q. Do you know anything about his reputation?

A. I do not.

Q. Do you know anything about his habits?

A. Only from his general appearance; from that I should say he was a drinking man, drunk to excess.

Q. Do you know anything about his reputation for truth?

A. I do not.

Q. Are you acquainted with Governor Smith?

A. I am.

Q. How long have you known him?

A. Since he came to this city.

Q. Have you visited the Home frequently?

A. Not within the last year; I have prior to that time.

Q. You have heard what the gentlemen have said who have delivered their testimony here this evening; does your observation of the Home and of the governor lead you to agree with them in their sentiments?

A. It does, entirely.

Mr. Arthur Simonds said:

I am 55 years of age; I have resided in Leavenworth thirty-seven years; I am a manufacturer and wholesale dealer in tobacco.

Q. Are you acquainted with the Governor of the Soldiers' Home?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you frequently visited the Home?

A. Very, very frequently, indeed.

Q. Have you had good opportunities for observing its management?

A. Yes, sir; I have.

Q. Have you had opportunities to observe the conduct of the governor in his intercourse with officers and members of the Home; have you ever been present when conversations took place between him and members of the Home?

A. Yes, sir; I have on several occasions.

Q. What has been his conduct with reference to his language and manner?

A. It has always been that of a gentleman toward each and every one of them. I never heard him say an abusive word, or swear at them, but always gave them good advice.

Q. Have you seen anything in the conduct of the governor during the last year and a half which you could criticize?

A. I will answer that, General, in my simple way; I have seen the governor when he is uptown a great many times; I presume I have seen him eighteen out of twenty times that he comes, and I have never seen him in any other condition than that of a perfect gentleman.

Q. Are you acquainted with a man by the name of McLouth?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you known him?

A. I have known him for several years, but I can not say how long.

Q. Where does he reside?

A. He did reside here; then when they built the Southwestern Railroad they named a town after him and he moved there, but whether he is living there now or not I do not know.

Q. Have you known or seen much of him within the last year?

A. I have seen him several times; yes, sir.

Q. Do you know anything about his habits?

A. I should say yes, sir, I did; in fact, I know I do.

Q. What are they?

A. It is very, very seldom, I am sorry to say, that he is not under the influence of liquor.

Q. Do you know anything about his reputation for truth; have you ever heard it questioned?

A. Well, in a business manner, yes; I have known him to give checks on the bank at McLouth, and they have been returned through our banks here not paid.

Q. You have known of them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had he cashed them?

A. He had in one instance that I know of—he had got his meals and drinks and the man who owns the restaurant had to pay him so much money, and the man that kept the restaurant had deposited the check in the bank, and it was returned unpaid. I do not know whether it was paid for afterwards or not.

Q. Do you know Mr. Lilley?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where does he live, and what is his occupation?

A. Well, if I am not mistaken, he is a printer by trade.

Q. Do you know anything about his habits?

A. Well, he is a poor fellow; he takes an awful sight of morphine; I am sorry to say he does.

Q. Is that his reputation?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Would you regard any statement made by him as liable to be inaccurate?

A. Well, under most circumstances in which I have seen him, I should take it with a great deal of allowance; in other words, I would want a great deal of salt with it. I do not think he is responsible for what he says the biggest part of the time.

Mr. J. W. Crancer answered in reply to inquiries:

Q. Are you acquainted with one McLouth?

A. I am.

Q. Where does he live?

A. I do not know where he lives at present. His home used to be at McLouth.

Q. How long have you known him?

A. I guess five or six years, at least.

Q. Have you had any opportunity to observe his habits?

A. Yes, sir; very frequently.

Q. What are they?

A. Most of the time I see him intoxicated; hardly ever catch him sober.

Q. Would you regard any statement of his, made from his casual observation of any incident, as thoroughly reliable?

A. I would not, unless it was substantiated by some better authority.

Q. Do you know a Mr. Lilley?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where does he reside and what is his occupation?

A. I think he lives here. He has been in the printing business, but I do not at this time think he is in any business, and has not been for the last year or two.

Q. What is his reputation for sobriety?

A. Very bad; and he is totally irresponsible for what he says or does, I think.

Q. Is this the common reputation of the man?

A. I think it is.

Q. Is it within your knowledge that the gentlemen who have signed this statement to the Board of Managers agree with you and the other gentlemen who have delivered testimony here this evening?

A. Yes; I unhesitatingly say yes.

Q. Are these gentlemen all that are in town that would agree with you?

A. No, sir; there are thousands of others of the same opinion; I think I am safe in saying thousands. There is no question but that this community is in full sympathy with Governor Smith, and indorses everything that he has done.

Mr. Carl Hoffman said:

I have resided in this city twenty-four years; I am 46 years of age, and my business is dealer in pianos and organs—music dealer.

Q. Are you acquainted with Col. A. J. Smith, governor of the Home?

A. I am, sir.

Q. How long have you known him?

A. I have known him ever since he came here.

Q. Have you visited the Home frequently?

A. Quite often; yes, sir.

Q. Have you had opportunities to observe the behavior and conditions of its members?

A. Yes, sir; I have.

Q. Have you had an opportunity to frequently observe the conduct of the governor?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What has been the result of your observation of the management of the Home?

A. I must say that I consider it a model establishment and its management is exceptionally fine, and I admire Governor Smith for being able to handle the Home in such a splendid manner.

Q. I wish to ask you if you have had good opportunities for observing the conduct of the governor?

A. I have had a number of times, personally as well as officially.

Q. Have you seen, within the last year and a half, anything in his conduct that you would criticize?—A. No, sir; I could not possibly.

Q. Are you acquainted with a man named McLouth?—A. No, I am not.

Q. Do you know a man by the name of Lilley?—A. Yes, sir; that is, I know him when I see him to speak to him on the street.

Q. Do you know anything about his reputation?—A. General reputation not very good.

Q. What is had about it?—A. You know what a bad standing of a man in a town is—the same as you come to a town and make inquiry in regard to a firm's standing; there is a certain smell (excuse the expression) about it.

Q. Do you know anything regarding his habits?
A. I can not say anything personally about the man; I only state the general standing of the man as given to us by fellow-citizens.

Capt. M. H. Insley, in answer to inquiries, said:
I have resided in Leavenworth for thirty-five years; my business has been in the banking business.

Q. You have been intimately acquainted with Governor Smith, and have had opportunities for closely observing the management of the Home?
A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you state in your own way what has been the result of your observations of both the Home and its governor?
A. From my observations I might say this: I have been a frequent visitor at the Home from the time its construction first commenced, and from what I have seen of Governor Smith and his management it has led me to believe that it has been well managed—that he is the right man in the right place.

Q. Have you observed anything in the governor's conduct during that close observation that you would criticize?
A. I have not, certainly, within the past three years.

Q. Do you know a Mr. McLouth?
A. I do.

Q. Where does he reside?
A. He resides at a little town in Jefferson County, or near a little town in Jefferson County, named McLouth.

Q. How long have you known him?
A. Twenty years, I should think.

Q. What are his habits?
A. His habits of late years are bad.

Q. In what way?
A. In the way of drinking. During a great deal of the time McLouth is not responsible for what he says or does; his mind is certainly weak, and the man, as I said before, is not, in my judgment, responsible a good part of the time.

Q. Do you know a man by the name of Lilley?
A. I do.

Q. Are you acquainted with his reputation?
A. I am.

Q. What is it?
A. It is bad; he is what is termed a "morphine fiend."

Q. Has he the reputation of having a fixed morphine habit?
A. He has.

Q. Would you consider his statement regarding an incident coming under his casual observation as thoroughly reliable?
A. I would not.

Mr. Alexander Caldwell recalled.
Q. I wish you would state, if you please, how came these gentlemen here who have given their testimony?

A. We were aware of the fact that this investigation was in progress, and feeling a great interest in the welfare of the Soldiers' Home, and believing that an effort was being made to do an injustice to Governor Smith, and an injury to the Home, I was asked if I would meet a few gentlemen at the National Hotel about half past 4 o'clock to-day. I did not know what the gentlemen proposed to do, but we met, fifty or more men, who are more than an average of the business standing in this community, as well as moral standing of the citizens. I do not think we could get another fifty men together in Leavenworth better socially, morally, or in business, than the gentlemen who have been here to-day. I met those gentlemen, and they organized the meeting by electing me chairman, and then appointed a committee of eight or ten, of which I was the chairman, to call upon the inspector-general, who was conducting this investigation, for the purpose of giving him any information that we might possess or answering any questions that he might choose to ask, and also for the purpose of presenting to the inspector-general a petition signed by fifty or more gentlemen, addressed to the Board of Managers, acquainting the Board and the inspector-general with the sentiments of the people of Leavenworth in regard to the management of the Home and with regard to Governor Smith. I want to add that it appeared to be the desire of every citizen to give to the inspector-general the exact facts in regard to the Home and the governor, Colonel Smith, so far as they know them, that simple justice might be done in this case. I want to say this—it has been stated that Governor Smith has been tyrannical and harsh in his management of the Home, but his reputation as a kind-hearted man, and his conduct among and with the citizens of Leavenworth, as well as at the Home, has been such as to make it impossible to think he would be harsh or cruel in his manner to the members of the Home. While there are only about fifty gentlemen present to-day, a thousand or more would have been present if they had been invited and had known the object of this meeting and had time to get here.

In anticipation of an inquiry which members may make, I will say that Colonel Smith, previous to his arriving at the Home in Leavenworth, had suffered from the excessive use of intoxicants. He took the Keeley cure and, deriving benefit from it, advised others to take it. But, Mr. Spenser, that he has continued to drink or that he is wanting in those finer qualities which constitute a gentleman I do not believe; but, not knowing him intimately, I take pleasure in referring to my friend from New York [Major POOLE], who has known Colonel Smith for many years and is able to speak from personal knowledge.

Mr. TALBERT. Is it a fact that they have these Keeley institutes at all these Soldiers' Homes?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I am not informed on that subject.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, do they have such an institute at Leavenworth, Kans.?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. TALBERT. A regularly established Keeley institute?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. My friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], who is a member of the Board, will be able to answer that question when he takes the floor.

Mr. Spenser, in addition to the testimony of the many persons called, I want to read Exhibit M.

To the Board of Managers of the National Military Home located at Leavenworth, Kans.

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned, citizens of Leavenworth, Kans., desire here and now to express the most kindly consideration for Governor Andrew J. Smith for the economic administration of affairs at the Home and for the uniform kind treatment and careful discipline administered to and required of the inmates of this institution.

We believe that the charges preferred against the governor are without cause and instigated from malicious motives.

We therefore respectfully ask, in the name of decency and good government, that Governor Smith be retained in his present position, as we, individually and collectively, from personal acquaintance and business contact, believe him to be far better equipped for the management of this institution than those who, by misrepresentation and false charges, are seeking to pull him down.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., October 18, 1894.

Gen. W. W. AVERILL, Bath, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: It was not my privilege to attend the meeting of citizens at the National Hotel of this city, or I should have gladly been there and added my testimony to that of the others.

I will not pretend to give any information as to the specific questions that formed the subjects of your investigation at the National Military Home here. Your proceedings should have made you more fully informed than I, but I do feel that I can endorse the general management of the Home. I have been a frequent visitor there, a number of the inmates have been members of my congregation and church, and I have enjoyed many opportunities as an interested citizen to acquaint myself with the condition of affairs there. What I say is also impartial, as I have received nothing but courtesy from any who are parties to the controversy.

Whatever may be the truth in the matter, I can not, from my personal knowledge, charge those who oppose Governor Smith with anything more than an honest, though intense, disagreement with him as to the principles upon which the Home should be managed. On the other hand, there probably are details in which I might differ in judgment with Colonel Smith.

Notwithstanding all this, I regard his administration as eminently successful. I doubt if you could easily find another man who could do as well in that position of almost unequalled difficulty. I know personally that the better class of citizens within my circle of acquaintance are practically unanimous in endorsing him. Not one soldier from the Home who has worshipped in my congregation has spoken of him otherwise than kindly. To the general public he is one of the most courteous and accommodating men I have ever seen. He is so regarded by the public, and as a result the Home has become a far more popular pleasure resort than the fort. I have never heard his honesty or honesty questioned by any not connected with the recent troubles in the Home. I am sure that the Keeley treatment at the Home has been a benefit both to the Home and to our city, by effecting the reformation of many of the unfortunate inmates of the Home. That Governor Smith has had any selfish interest in it is absurd. My knowledge of him, based upon an intimate personal acquaintance, leads me to believe that he unites in an unusual degree those qualities that preeminently qualify him for the place. He is a man of sterling qualities, and his removal would be regarded by our citizens as most unfortunate. I heartily unite with others in recommending his retention.

Very truly, yours,
EDWIN M. RANDALL, JR.

I read a copy of a letter to General Franklin from Rev. T. H. Kinella, Catholic chaplain, under date of February 29, 1896:

FEBRUARY 29, 1896.

Gen. W. B. FRANKLIN,
President Board of Managers, N. H. D. V. S.

GENERAL: In view of certain adverse criticisms of the management of this Western Branch now going the rounds of the press, I have the honor to submit to you my personal experience as testimony in rebuttal of all such attacks, whether emanating from private malice or ill-advised sympathy. As a Catholic priest, living in this community for many years, I feel that I have exceptional opportunities to know the true inwardness of the motives which inspire these attacks. They are base, and in no sense represent the sentiments of our people, either within or without the Home. Among so large a number of old men, bent under physical, mental, and moral infirmity, consequent on old age, it is to be expected that discontent and imaginary wrongs should find a place among their mental feelings. Such a condition of mind, though confined to a few, is of course to be expected, and yet unprincipled lawyers and cyclonic newspapers use these ravings of decrepitude to defeat authority and breed discontent.

I deem it my duty to lay before you, as president of the Board of Managers the true state of affairs. With a full sense, therefore, of my position before the public, I make bold to say that the management of this Branch Home is able, humane, and generous to an eminent degree. Order, of course, must be maintained, and the vicious few must be suppressed. On these two points the overwhelming membership of the Home is in full accord. The Keeley treatment is but a means to this end. It has been successful, and successful to an extent that can be measured only by a comparison between the present state of affairs and conditions and the same as existent before its introduction into the Home. I was here before the Western Branch Home was in being. I watched its construction and saw its halls gradually peopled. The bells of our church joined their music to the general shout of joy that filled the air when first you sent us the news—the glorious news that the Soldiers'

Home would be at our gates. We too were liberal, as you well know, yet the day quickly came when all good citizens regretted the presence of the Western Branch in their midst, so great was the influx of men and women of low character and intemperate habits. The city authorities had to increase the police force; the sheriff of the county was kept busy long after each pay day, and I honestly believe Governor Smith himself became alarmed. This was some five or six years ago. In April, 1892, the Keeley treatment for alcoholism was introduced, and the gradual improvement in the morals and manners of the drinking class of the Home has given an air of peace and contentment to this Home which it had not known before. The change is very marked, and it certainly proves the efficacy of the treatment.

I am in a position to obtain the very best testimony in regard to this much-talked-of treatment, and I must say that I would show myself indifferent to the best interests of humanity as well as to the welfare of the veterans of the late war should I remain silent on this occasion. I am fully convinced that the Keeley League has worked a transformation in this Home; that the treatment has been, on the whole, a gratifying success, and that, what is more to the point, no one to my knowledge has been unduly influenced to take the treatment or to pay the expenses entailed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) THOS. H. KINSELLA, Catholic Chaplain.

I also read a letter from Rev. W. J. Gillespie, the Protestant chaplain:

Gen. W. B. FRANKLIN,
President Board of Managers, N. H. D. V. S.

GENERAL: I hereby beg leave to lay before you the following facts in the interest of justice and the best interest of this Branch Home.

2. I have been here, as you know, for more than nine years; that is, almost from the establishment of this Branch, and have had opportunity of knowing the facts I am about to state.

3. From 1866 up until about three years ago the poor old men who came here were the victims of the saloons, brothels, and thugs, who seemed to regard old soldiers as their proper prey.

4. The public highway from Leavenworth to the Home, and, indeed, the limits surrounding the Home, became infested with disreputable places where abandoned men and women lay in wait for our people, especially about pension day.

So disgraceful had these conditions become that the respectable men and women of Leavenworth bitterly complained of the sights and sounds and indecent exposures on the part of our drugged and drunken men on the public highways.

5. About three years ago the Board of Managers permitted Colonel Smith to establish a course of treatment for such of our people as had an uncontrollable drink habit, and who wished to be cured of it. The results have been wonderful. More than thirteen hundred men have availed themselves of this treatment. I have personally talked with more than a thousand of them. I have never heard one of them intimate that he had been forced to take the cure, or that he had been injured by it. On the contrary, hundreds of them have told me how thankful they were for it, and how much their general health had been benefited since freed from alcoholic disease.

Morally the change in the men has been as marked as it is physically. In the barracks, on the grounds, the most wonderful change in the gentlemanly bearing of the men has taken place.

6. Through the efforts of Colonel Smith and the officers and members of the Home who have aided him, many of the vilest places along the highways leading to the Home have been closed. The sight of drunken men lying on the roadside or making indecent exposures of their persons is almost unknown. Not only are there no longer complaints from citizens about the members of the Home, but, on the other hand, frequent expressions of gratification are heard over the change effected, and the most influential people in business and social circles are very free in their expressions of commendation of Colonel Smith's work as governor of the Home.

On February 18 last, when the Editorial Association of the State of Kansas visited the Home, Col. D. R. Anthony, their chairman and the editor of the Leavenworth Times, the most influential paper probably in Kansas, paid a very glowing tribute to the wonderfully successful management of Col. Andrew J. Smith as governor of this Home.

7. May I, without offense, express the hope that the Board of Managers will not permit any misrepresentations made by designing parties or the enemies of the veteran soldier to influence it so as to put any obstacle in the way of Colonel Smith in this great effort to rescue brave but unfortunate men from the grasp of the insatiable appetite which has brought mental, physical, and financial ruin to so many of our comrades.

Grand as has been Colonel Smith's material management of this Home, when history comes to be written, many believe that his greatest achievement will have been found in the restored health, hopes, and homes of the men who, for the first time in many years, have found themselves free from the insatiable thirst for alcoholic stimulants.

Respectfully,

(Signed) W. J. GILLESPIE,
Protestant Chaplain.

A true copy:

ROBERT HAYES,
First Lieutenant and Adjutant.

In reply to the charge which has been made that General Franklin procured the appointment of Colonel Smith and has retained him as the governor of the Home at Leavenworth, Kans., because of some family connection or close relation in the late war, I wish to say that Colonel Smith is neither a relative nor connection of General Franklin, nor did Smith ever serve on General Franklin's staff. There was upon the Board of Managers when the Kansas Home was established a gentleman who at the time was also governor of that State. He had been one of her most distinguished soldiers and had contributed to her glory and credit by his skill, bravery, and capacity in the late war. I refer to Gen. John A. Martin. It was he, Mr. Speaker, who asked for and secured the appointment of Col. Andrew J. Smith as governor of the Home. Colonel Smith had shown his capacity as a subordinate officer in the Home in Maine. Governor Martin, desiring to have the Home in his State opened under the most successful auspices, asked for and secured the appointment of the present governor. He has retained the confidence of the Board of Managers, and everyone is equally responsible for his retention.

It is not for me to raise the question of propriety as to the conduct of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], who has undertaken to report the secrets of the Military Committee. The chairman of that committee [Mr. HULL] is here in charge of this measure; he will have his time in this discussion. The conduct of any member who attempts to disclose the proceedings of an executive session is one upon which all men in this House must have fixed opinions. It is enough for me to say that the Committee on Military Affairs has recommended the four gentlemen named for the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. Speaker, as to the general management of these Homes, which the gentleman from Kansas has so bitterly condemned, I wish to say that we are fortunate in having upon the floor of this House a Member who has many times represented an important district in the State of Indiana and has had long service upon the Board of Managers. It will fall upon him to explain—at least I shall not undertake the task to do so—the methods by which these various Homes are governed. We have in the other branch of Congress two distinguished Senators (MITCHELL of Wisconsin and SEWELL of New Jersey) who have long been members of this Board. I am authorized to say that General Franklin's name did not come to the committee by any action or wish of his own, nor from anyone who can be regarded as his personal representative. His reelection has been urged by members of the Board and a large number of men who know his high character and qualifications.

The assumption which has been put forth by the gentleman from Kansas that General Franklin has neglected to properly perform any of the various duties devolving upon him in respect to the management of the Homes, the public property, or donated funds is a criticism upon the act of Congress establishing these Homes. The Board has complied with the requirements of the law creating it. If that law is in any way subject to criticism—if any gentleman wishes to modify what may be termed the organic law of these institutions, let him propose amendments for the consideration of the House.

I may say in addition (if I have not already made it sufficiently plain) that the member of the Board living nearest any particular Home is charged with the general supervision of the Home and the responsibility of looking after it and correcting any irregularities. Colonel Cooke, of Kansas, has had this particular Home under his supervision, subject to the general rules and regulations established for the government of the Home. I have no doubt that all matters connected with the management of the Home will be fully and amply explained by my friend from the State of Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

I stated in the beginning of my remarks that I wished to address myself to the House as a member living nearest to New England, from which States two members are to be elected, and as one having a greater personal interest in the selection of members from that section of the country than those living in the Central and Western States. I have in a feeble manner discharged the obligation resting upon me as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and a member of this House. I have heretofore spoken of General Franklin simply as a public officer, as a man charged with important duties which he ought not to neglect, which he is too wise and too able to fall short of performing. I will go as far as any man here in requiring a strict and exact performance of the duties imposed upon him and the Board of Managers.

Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me, I should like to say a few words in respect to my personal feelings and relations to General Franklin.

It is now nearly thirty-five years since I was among the number of those who, unacquainted with war as a science or art came back on that memorable and unhappy Monday, the 22d of July, 1861, from the battle of Bull Run. Some rested in camps on the other side of the Potomac; others came to Washington. General demoralization prevailed. New commanders were given us, who undertook the task and responsibility of organizing, instructing, and equipping an army out of these demoralized troops. To learn how well they accomplished this task, you have to read the glorious history of the Army of the Potomac. I was a captain in a regiment of two-year volunteers, and early in August called at the headquarters in Alexandria to get a pass to Washington, and for the first time met Col. William B. Franklin, of the Twelfth United States Infantry, who had been assigned to the command of the forces on the Virginia side south of Long Bridge. That interview resulted in an acquaintance which has lasted until to-day. I had been an invalid for five or six years, and for that reason and want of opportunity lacked many of the qualifications which should have been possessed by a man of 26 years. I was without knowledge of military affairs, and if this Government has just reason to be satisfied with the service I was able to render in the four subsequent years—in following the flag—in discharging the duties of the several positions to which the Administration saw fit to appoint me—I say that the value of those services is due in great part to the care, the counsel, and the instruction given me by Gen. William B. Franklin.

I speak as an individual, with a heart full of gratitude, of my devotion, my affection, and my sincere regard for General Franklin. He was my friend when I was young, inexperienced in public affairs, totally unacquainted with the duties of the position I had undertaken; he gave me instruction which enabled me to perform them, with at least some credit to myself and I hope useful to my country. While in the performance of my legislative duty I know neither friend nor enemy. I will, however, as an individual, stand before anybody, any tribunal, and defend the purity of character, the ability and devotion to duty and to his country of Maj. Gen. William B. Franklin.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to him with feelings which are heartfelt and sincere, because whatever of ability I brought to the public service and honors I have won I owe largely to him. I appreciate the value of his services not only to me, but to his country, as a teacher in those days of devotion to national unity, when the services of such a man were of supreme importance to the nation in educating the mass of willing, but uninstructed volunteers. I trust the House will pardon me for my digression from the main question, and for thus speaking of a comrade in arms for whom I have cherished and still cherish the fondest and most affectionate sentiments of esteem and devotion. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman from New York yield me the remainder of his time, or yield it to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Certainly. I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have not the voice or the assurance of the gentleman from Kansas. I hope the members of the House will, on account of my diffidence, and I assure you it is great when I get on my feet, give me the attention they would give to a beginner and make any allowance necessary for any of my shortcomings that may be apparent.

This is a subject of profound interest to this country, and is of special interest to the honor and integrity of every good soldier. Are we to come in here to-day and attack the reputation of as good soldiers as ever did battle, and throw their reputation to the winds because we will not hear but one side of the case?

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] has seen proper to state that what I did not know about the Soldiers' Homes was enough to fill a book. That is true, although I have been a member, and an active member, of the Board of Managers for something over four years; but what I know of the character of matter he has brought to the attention of the House during the discussion to-day would fill a library.

Since I have been a member of the Board of the seven different Homes, I have information of the same kind, and enough of the same kind of literature that the gentleman has presented to the House to-day to fill a book or a library. Everything he has brought to the attention of the House, or nearly everything, has been carefully investigated not only by the Board of Managers of the Home, but particularly by a subcommittee of the Board. Mr. Morrill, of Kansas, now governor of that State, was for over three years a member of the Board, and as such the local manager of the Leavenworth Home. Col. Sidney Cook, also of Kansas, has been a member of the Board for over two years, and both of them in their capacity as local managers, with General Pearson, a distinguished soldier of the State of Pennsylvania, and General Averell, have investigated the charges that have been brought in here at different times. They did not go into a partial investigation. Look at the volume the gentleman from New York, General CURTIS, brought before you, if you think they did not go to the bottom of the matter. And the investigation by General Pearson and Governor Morrill, if anything, went more into detail, and every witness brought before them had the assurance that whatever he said he might feel absolutely satisfied should have no influence upon his status in the Home. In that way the facts were brought out.

And before forgetting it I wish to say in this connection that as members of the Board of Managers we go to each Home, excepting to that in California, once a year, as required by law. We do not go to visit from one Home straight around once a year, but from time to time we visit all of the Homes, except the California Home, as the law assumes we should. Owing, however, to the great expense attending it, we have not visited the California Home more than once in four or five years; but the local manager comes from it from time to time and gives us in detail what is going on there.

The gentleman from Kansas said that what I do not know on this subject would fill a volume, and yet he asked me a question the other day about a bond. I knew that by a provision put into an appropriation bill the system of keeping the accounts at the Homes had been changed, and it was decided that the president of the Board of Managers should not be the treasurer of the Home. Owing to that change in the system, for three months men in the several Homes were without the necessary funds to make purchases that ought to have been made, on account of that bill. And when it was settled and this "striker" of General Franklin was made treasurer of the Home by the Board of Managers, General Franklin had but one vote, just as any of the rest of us had. And, Mr. Speaker, while we as members are not as a rule as well informed as he is—I know I do not know as much as he does in these matters—yet my vote is just as potent as his, and whatever is wrong in the Leavenworth Home—or in any other, for that matter—I assume my share of the responsibility for, whether because of ignorance or because I have not had time to study the matters, it makes no difference which.

Whenever we go to one of those Homes, as I was saying, we see that every soldier who is in the Home that day is notified that if he has any complaint of any nature to make he is invited to come before the Board and state just what the complaint is. He is heard, and not in the presence of the governor or any officer of the Home, either, and is informed that what he says to us shall not operate against him as a member of the Home. That is done at every Home in every case.

Why, in 1866, gentlemen of the committee, the first National Home was established at Togus, Me.; in 1867, those at Dayton and Milwaukee; in 1870, that at Hampton, Va.; in 1885, that at Leavenworth, Kans.; in 1886, that at Santa Monica, Cal.; and in 1888, that at Marion, Ind.

In these Homes 78,000 men have been cared for, and 15,000 have died. During the last year there were, in the National Homes, 20,600 men cared for, and the average attendance was about 16,000. There have been expended from the organization of the Homes to the present time over $40,000,000, and no man dare say, or can substantiate the truth of the assertion, that there has been one single farthing lost in the expenditure of this great sum.

And here let me say something about the trust fund. As may be seen from the report of the Board of Managers for the year 1895, these trust funds originated in the benevolence of two of our patriotic citizens—a Mr. Ward and a Mr. Stinson. These worthy men left legacies of considerable amount and committed the care and expenditure of their bequests to the Board of Managers of the National Home for Volunteer Soldiers. As trustees the Board considered they had no right to surrender active personal control of this money; to have covered the amounts into the Treasury would, in the opinion of the Board, have been a violation of this sacred trust, for then the wishes of the donors could not have been realized unless Congress should be pleased to appropriate from the legacies. These trusts have been continuously at interest, and the income from interest would have been lost to the old soldiers had the principal been stored in the United States Treasury. Refer to the report of the Board and you will see what were the amounts of these legacies, what the interest earnings, what disbursements from this source have been made, and what the balance on hand. A benevolent lady, who does not wish to parade her name, has also given and equipped a library for the Dayton Home.

I will say that the Board of Managers are the creatures of Congress. Congress created the corporation. Congress named the members who are to belong to this corporation, and as such corporation they hold the lands, or at least a greater portion of them. Some have been deeded directly to the United States, but they hold the rest in trust; they could not dispose of them or make title excepting for the United States.

Coming to the cost of the maintenance of these several Homes—but I am not going to detain you long—I will say to you that the efficiency of the management of this Home has been demonstrated by the report of the Inspector-General, the same Inspector-General's report that you have been invited to read, and I hope you will read it—not alone the parts that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] has selected for you, but every word of it. And when you come to read the report that this same Inspector-General also made to the Secretary of War, you will find more criticism on the keeping of accounts in the War Department than in those kept by the Board of Managers.

And let me tell you further what you will find, that the Home for regular soldiers that is under the management of the War Department has cost per capita $197.89, while that of the National Home has been but $117.64, a difference of $80.25 per man in favor of the management of the National Home—about 69 per cent in favor of the National Home. Of those in the National Home 5,600, or one-third of the whole number, have been in the hospital because of their infirmities and their greater age. The average age of the members of the National Home is over 60 years—pretty nearly 61 years—while the average age of the men out here at the Home for regulars is only a little more than 51 years.

The men in the National Homes are there because of their infirmities, their disabilities, and the comparatively small expense in the care of the members of the National Homes has been achieved notwithstanding the fact that about one-third of the number have been cared for in the hospitals. Let me say to you further that if you will go to these National Homes—and I refer to all of them—you will find the men absolutely satisfied, or as much so as they can be where they must be deprived of the society of wife, mother, or sister; that they have the cleanest houses to sleep in, the cleanest beds, the cleanest tables from which to eat, the cleanest and the best-cooked food and the greatest variety, that any soldiers have ever had in the world.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TALBERT. Is it not a fact that there is no discrimination made against soldiers who are drawing pensions in these Homes?

Mr. STEELE. That is true.

Mr. TALBERT. That they draw pensions and also have the privilege of being inmates of these Homes, and get the same treatment?

Mr. STEELE. Yes; without limit as to the amount of the pension so far as the law is concerned; but the Board of Managers, upon their own responsibility, excepting in rare cases or very meritorious or distressing cases, do not admit men who are drawing more than $16 a month, very few above $12. Lately there have been a few men totally blind or without legs or without arms cared for in the Homes, notwithstanding the fact that they receive more than $12 or $16 per month pensions. Why, there are a great many men in the Homes who would not be there if they could help it. We have cancer patients whose people do not care to board them. A man came to me in my own district not very long ago and said: "I must go to the Soldiers' Home. My wife is dead, and while I can go to my son-in-law's house, I can see that he does not want me there. I could get work if it were not for this sore that is eating out my life, but I can not get board. Therefore I am compelled to go to the Home. I want to give up my pension; I want the Home to use it." But we have no authority to use it. We may not use it and do not want to use it; too many wives and other dependents would be deprived of it.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not wish to take up the gentleman's time, but I will ask him if he will give this House some information about this Keeley institution?

Mr. STEELE. I was going to speak about the Keeley Club. The Keeley Club was formed in 1899 or 1898, at Leavenworth. Since the beginning of that organization there have been something over 1,800 inmates at that Home who have taken the Keeley cure. Of these there have been about 13 per cent of lapses. Two hundred and forty men, confirmed drunkards who had got to the Home because they were drunkards, have taken the Keeley cure and have rejoined their families and are now making their own living at home.

An officer high in railroad circles took the Keeley cure of his own volition. And I assert that there is not a single soldier who has taken the Keeley cure except of his own volition, and after they have gone home have done well.

A civil engineer, as I say, of the Missouri Pacific Railroad took the cure, and after staying at the Home awhile and demonstrating that he was cured he went out into business again and is now drawing a salary of $3,500 a year. In other words, it is shown to have been a great advantage to the Home. The Board of Managers approached the subject reluctantly. It was something that the Board did not know anything about, and they were afraid of it. But after hearing Governor Smith, who had himself taken the cure, we concluded to let them try it at a reduced price. Instead of $25—Dr. Keeley's regular price at that time—the Board said he might charge $10. The men of their own accord have formed what they call a Keeley Club, and charge $20. This is an arrangement of their own. Twenty dollars is paid, of which ten is the fee, and with a part of the surplus they have built a beautiful chapel at the Home at Leavenworth. They expend the surplus as they see proper. And now I want to read what this Keeley League says here. I will not take the trouble to read the whole of it, but it says:

At a regular meeting held by the Veterans' Keeley League in its hall at the Western Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Leavenworth County, Kans., Sunday, February 22, 1896, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, namely:

"Whereas certain interested parties, in their efforts to cast discredit upon the administration of the governor of the Western Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, have charged through the public press that members of this Home have been coerced into taking the Keeley cure; and

"Whereas, while we are fully aware of the motives which prompted it, such a charge, if allowed to remain uncontradicted, would stand as a serious imputation upon the intelligence and manhood of the members of our league; Therefore

"Be it resolved, That we, the officers and members of Veterans' Keeley League, No. 1, of the Western Branch Home, resent with just indignation the insulting reflection upon our integrity contained in said charge, and we unqualifiedly denounce the malignant spirit which does not hesitate to injure a good cause for the sole purpose of gratifying personal spite.

"Resolved, That individually and collectively we hereby deny that we or any of us were ever coerced or intimidated into taking the Keeley treatment, or that we were influenced by any other means than the kindly advice and solicitation of those who have our best interests in view, and we furthermore declare that no man within our knowledge has ever been in any way coerced to take the cure since its establishment at this Home.

"Resolved, That we, in taking the Keeley treatment, did so voluntarily and freely, of our own accord, after hearing of and seeing the good results obtained by others; that it has proved to be of inestimable benefit to us individually and to our families, and that we shall ever cherish a deep sense of gratitude toward Governor Andrew J. Smith, who, in the face of many serious obstacles, has brought this great boon within our reach.

"Resolved, That we, now present at this meeting, numbering 304 members of the Veterans' Keeley League of the Western Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, do hereby denounce as false and malicious all charges of coercion brought against Col. Andrew J. Smith, governor of this Branch Home, basing such action upon our familiarity with his character and the nature of his work in the reclamation of the drunkards in our midst; and it is our wish that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to Gen. William B. Franklin, president Board of Managers, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, Hartford, Conn., and to that end the secretary is hereby directed to prepare a copy hereof for that purpose and send same to that officer."

JOHN T. PEET.

President Veterans' Keeley League, No. 1, of the United States.

Attest: E. A. TRADER, Secretary.

I have here a letter from the Protestant chaplain of the Home, commending it in the highest terms; I have here a letter from the Catholic chaplain, commending it also in the highest terms, as well as the management of the Home. As was stated by the gentleman who preceded me, Governor Smith came from the Tugus Home. I happened to be a member of the Committee on Military Affairs when Governor Martin was elected. He stated to the Board in my presence—members of the Board who were before the Committee on Military Affairs, "If you will allow Smith, of the Tugus Home [he was treasurer there], to go out to Leavenworth as governor of that Home, then I will accept the position as manager." He knew what troubles were in store for him unless he had what he regarded as a competent man for governor. And Governor Morrill speaks for him. I will ask the Clerk to read what the governor says:

The Clerk read as follows:

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 8, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I was local manager of the Western Branch Home for three years. It was then, and I believe is now, the best-managed Soldiers' Home in the country. I introduced the Keeley cure into the home. See Board minutes. No one was forced to take cure during that time, and I do not believe there has since.

E. N. MORRILL.

Mr. STEELE. I also have a dispatch here which I will ask the Clerk to read. I ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], who is familiar with gentlemen residing in Kansas, to state whether the signers of this dispatch are not every one of them reputable, honorable men.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 8, 1896.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned citizens of Leavenworth City, in behalf of common justice and fairness, desire to express our disapproval of the unjust aspersions cast upon Governor Smith, of the Soldiers' Home located adjacent to this city. We are well acquainted with his manner of procedure and its results, and can cheerfully state as to the marvellously good results in the improved appearance and good behavior of the old men under his charge. He is attentive and exceedingly watchful of his men, encouraging them in their reformation, and his expressions of kindness make him with the old boys, and especially with the 1,300 old Keeleyites, an accepted and respected leader. We fully believe his withdrawal would surely jeopardize the continued success and be the cause of many of the old men again becoming victims of their former vices. We are actuated in this matter by the hope that you will succeed in placing the affair in its proper light before Congress, that justice may be done a deserving and worthy officer, and that our appeal may be heard in the prayer of your petitioners.

(Signed:) H. M. Aller, police judge; Anton Maduska, chief of police; E. P. Wilson, president Great Western Store Company; William H. Page, pastor First Presbyterian Church; Thomas H. Bosa, pastor First Congregational Church; Rev. Joseph Shortz, rector Epiphany Catholic Church; Rev. P. J. Kennedy, Cathedral, Leavenworth, Kans.; Very Rev. J. T. Cunningham; E. W. Snyder and W. B. Nickels, president and cashier of the Manufacturers' National Bank; Edward Carroll, cashier Leavenworth National Bank; J. W. Fogler and Amos E. Wilson, vice-president and cashier First National Bank; J. W. Spratley and E. A. Kelly, president and cashier, Union Savings Bank.

Hon. G. W. STEELE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BLUE. Now, Mr. Speaker, when the time comes I will give this House to understand what motives are behind that, including the governor of Kansas, so long as he has put himself in this attitude. I could fill a volume with telegrams of reputable men, but I will show the motives behind this—

Mr. STEELE. What I would like to know is if these are not reputable men?

Mr. BLUE. Some of them are, and some are practically unknown. I do not suppose that several of the ministers whose names are signed know any more about it than they do about the regions of his satanic majesty. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. Do you not think the men who signed that telegram knew as much about the Home as the signers of those papers you read knew about what they were swearing to?

Mr. BLUE. Oh, no, my dearly beloved friend.

Mr. STEELE. I think they do. I would like the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] to state what he knows of these men, if he is here.

Mr. BLUE. I want to suggest to you before you yield the floor, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] said while on the floor that all these charges had been gone over. I call your attention now specifically to the fact that there were 30 to 50 men of the Regular Army in the Home when old soldiers were turned away; and I want to call attention—

Mr. STEELE. You have made your speech once.

Mr. BLUE. I want you to explain these things before you quit the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. SPALDING. I find in this report here of the Inspector-General of the Homes that there were condemned during the year at this Home 72,656 articles of all descriptions, whose original cost price was $46,868.14, and the property sold realized $1,523.87. What was the character of this property? This report does not explain.

Mr. STEELE. The general character of that would be old harness, old tents for use when the men were out, condemned shoes, articles of equipment taken from the hospitals, and property of such character as has been issued and has been used up or worn out, or has been hopelessly damaged and was inspected and condemned, as you, as a soldier, fully understand is bound to occur.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLUE. I call your attention to a fact with reference to this question, and I think the gentleman will be given all the time he wants. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana be permitted to proceed until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLUE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] stated that all these charges had been investigated, by such an investigation as this Board gives; but I call your attention to the fact that the charge of Governor Smith having been drunk in February last, as proved here, has never been investigated.

Mr. STEELE. As to that I can not make any answer on my own responsibility, or of my own knowledge, but from the character of your ex parte witnesses, from the way they testify, I should judge that it would require a great deal of this character of testimony to establish the charge so that I would believe it. There are a hundred thousand people in the United States who have taken the Keeley cure, and the eyes of all those people are upon Governor Smith, who is at the head of the organization known as the Keeley League of the United States. He was a good soldier, and the only weakness I have ever heard charged against him was that at one time he was a drinking man; but, as has been stated, he took the Keeley cure, and he has since conducted himself so well that he is at the head of the organization of men who have taken the cure. Therefore, I do not think the charge is likely to be true. I do not think he ought to hold the presidency of the organization, because he has enough to attend to at home.

I wish the committee to understand that unless there is a quorum present—seven members—the Board never undertakes to do business. It is a quorum of the Board that acts, and not General Franklin. General Franklin, because he is president of the Board, and because, as was said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS], we all have implicit confidence in his integrity and ability, is allowed to exercise certain authority; but it would be just as reasonable for me to question the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] about each particular item in an appropriation bill that we have passed by the Appropriations Committee, of which he is a member, as for him to expect every member of the Board to be able to go into all the details of administration in the various Homes. But, Mr. Speaker, when the Board visits the Homes, they see that every detail is properly carried out and that the Homes are administered for the comfort and the betterment of the condition of all the old soldiers.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. How often does this Board of Managers meet?

Mr. STEELE. They meet quarterly, or oftener if the business requires it.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. How long are they generally in session?

Mr. STEELE. We are there long enough to go over the estimates sent in from the various Homes. The Board examines those estimates and determine what they can get along with at each Home.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. My question was, about how much time does the Board spend in that business? How long are you together in those meetings?

Mr. STEELE. On an average, from five to seven days.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. And that occurs four times a year?

Mr. STEELE. Not merely at the meetings for official business; but, for instance, when we meet here we go over all these estimates, and then we generally visit one of the Homes, so by the time we have completed the work of that meeting it has occupied five or ten days.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. How often do you go to a Home?

Mr. STEELE. Once a year, excepting to the Pacific Home.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, there are several gentlemen who desire to be heard on this resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that the debate may run until we adjourn this afternoon; that the consideration of the resolution be resumed to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal, and that the debate continue until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TRACEY. I shall have to object to that.

Mr. HULL. I will modify my request so as to ask that the debate continue until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TRACEY. I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. STEELE. Let it be remembered at this point that we, as Managers, excepting the president and secretary, get no pay whatever for our services, and do not expect it. We give our time freely, and get only our actual expenses. What we want, outside of our hotel bills and our transportation service, we pay for. The compensation to us is wholly in feeling that we are giving aid and comfort in a noble work. The Inspector-General of the Army says of us, on page 6 of his report:

The buildings erected at the newer Branches seem well suited for their purpose, and were they not taxed beyond their utmost capacity would leave nothing to be desired.

Again he says, page 6:

It is evident that the officials of the Home are actuated by the most humane sentiments in providing shelter for needy newcomers, but this should hardly be at the expense of the other inmates. The limit has been reached and passed, and appeal for further relief must be addressed to those who alone may decide whether or not the door and all other avenues of relief shall be closed to disabled old veterans. Some of the houses in which these old soldiers now sleep were never properly constructed nor suitable for continuous abode by such occupants.

Further on he says:

According to report, the annual cost of clothing per capita averages but $15.274, which seems extremely low for the warm and comfortable raiment provided; and even this allowance, while possibly too restricted for some articles, like shirts, may be excessive in others. The food is substantial and well cooked, though perhaps a diet more suited to the advanced age of the members might be had at some of the Homes; the large kitchens and inviting dining halls are admirably adapted for the purpose, and everywhere systematic and economic management is apparent, and several branches furnish remarkable models, deserving study and imitation. The daily cost of the raw ration, as reported, averages $0.1491 per capita, and of the cooked ration $0.1639, though the prices paid for supplies vary under successive contracts at the same place and are not everywhere the same.

Then he goes on to speak of the character of the rations and clothing (page 8):

The annual cost of maintenance per capita reported varies from $85.67 at the Southern Branch to $139.34 at the Pacific Branch, and the average for all branches is $117.04, according to the figures presented to me, which may have been somewhat reduced. The contract system has hardly been worked very skillfully yet, and, therefore, not as successfully as it seems capable of being used. All, doubtless, agree that appropriations for food should go nowhere but into the stomachs of the men.

The quality of the property and stores on hand seemed to be generally suitable for the purpose for which purchased, and commendable seal was displayed by the officers in the care of all confided to their charge.

There were three changes during the year in the officers at the several Branches. The officials seem to be assiduously devoted to their duties and conscientiously administer them with an eye single to the welfare and comfort of those placed by the nation under their charge. An efficient and economical administration was patent on every side.

Now I want to read further from what this same Inspector-General of the Army has said. Hear what he says about Governor Smith (page 35 of his report):

Governor A. J. Smith, to whose untiring energy and great resourcefulness much of the good work accomplished at this Branch is due, has remained in charge.

Taking the number of trials during the year for infractions against the Home rules and regulations as a criterion, the discipline at this Home compares favorably with that of any of the other Branches.

My friend here talks about the saloons in these Homes. There is no saloon at the Home in Indiana, but just outside of it are 8 or 10 grogshops to which the men go—not saloons, where they would merely get beer and where they would be compelled to behave themselves, but grogshops where they are not only made drunk, but are systematically robbed every pay day. And at that Home a greater per cent of the men were, by reason of the presence of these grogshops, taken in charge during the year than at the Leavenworth Home. They were not confined. There is a guard-house, or, as it is now called, a light room, but there is no punishment administered in the way of confinement to any of the men, but they are put into what are called light rooms and kept there until they are able to take care of themselves. The experience of the Board has been that there is less drinking or drunkenness where beer is sold at the Home store than there is where the men do their drinking off the Home grounds. They are under surveillance and are not robbed. But while this was the case at the Indiana Home, there were, according to the report, only 5 per cent taken charge of in this way at the Leavenworth Home.

I do not feel called upon to defend Governor Smith. I do not feel that it ought to be necessary to do so. I do not understand why the president of the Board of Managers should be attacked because of the conduct of one man in whom he has no more interest than he has in the governor of any other Home. These Homes are all under the charge of the Board of Managers. Does it not occur to gentlemen of the House as a singular thing that the management should be so faulty at the Leavenworth Home while there is no complaint coming from any other Home.

Mr. MILNES. I understood the gentleman to say that there was no "guardhouse" at any of these Homes. I refer him to page 36 of the document he has in his hand.

Mr. STEELE. I mean that it is not maintained as a guard-house. As I have said, the men are placed in what are called light rooms.

Mr. MILNES. "Guardhouse" is the name used in the report. Mr. STEELE. The men are placed in those light rooms, but not for punishment, only until they are able to take care of themselves.

Mr. BLUE. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. BLUE. Has the gentleman never heard any complaint in regard to the Togus Home?

Mr. STEELE. I have heard complaints from men who have been dishonorably discharged from that Home.

Mr. BLUE. Have you not heard it charged that there was a very bad state of affairs at the Togus Home?

Mr. STEELE. I have heard no charge that has not been investigated or will not be investigated.

Mr. BLUE. Investigated by whom?

Mr. STEELE. By the Board.

Mr. MILNES. Will the gentleman please give us more precise information in regard to the saloon run at this Home? Is it run under the direction of the board of control?

Mr. STEELE. At these Homes they have what are called stores, and in these stores beer is kept. Even in the great State of Maine the governor, who is a prohibitionist, who never himself drinks intoxicating liquors, found that it was utterly impossible to control the men, to keep them from getting drunk at the Home in that prohibition State until he put beer in the store and made strict regulations for its sale.

Mr. MILNES. It is, then, the policy of the Board to run a saloon at one of the institutions and a "jag cure" at the other? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. It is the policy of the Board to manage the Homes in a way which, it seems to them, will be for the very best interests of the soldier. And it is a question whether we shall allow them to sell a little beer within the Home, where the sales can be regulated and the officers in charge can see that no man gets drunk, or whether the inmates of the Home shall be allowed to go to grogshops just outside and buy all the liquor they want and become drunk.

Mr. MILNES. Is it true, as was stated by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], that the saloon—or "store," as the gentleman from Indiana calls it—at Leavenworth made over $13,000 last year out of these old soldiers by the sale of beer to them?

Mr. STEELE. As a matter of fact that is like some other of the details that have been gone over. I do not know what the profit was, but I do not have any idea that it was anything like that on the sale of beer. The report, however, will show.

Mr. SPALDING. If the gentleman will permit me, the report of the Inspector of the Army—not the inspector of the Home—says the profit of the beer hall at this Home for the year amounted to $13,896.23.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, well; there are a great many articles besides beer for sale; no whisky.

A MEMBER. I thought they had all taken the gold cure out there, that nobody was drinking beer.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he thinks it right that this Government should authorize such a thing at these Homes, and that this amount should be made, or allowed to be made, by speculating in such an article of traffic as that?

Mr. STEELE. Well, the Board sees proper to permit it, for what they regard as good reasons, and every cent of the profit goes to or for the benefit or amusement of the soldiers, all of them; and only a comparatively small per cent of them are drinking men. Their average age is now fully 61 years, and the unfortunate chronics do most of the drinking.

Mr. MILNES. Do you think it right that they should be allowed to make nearly $14,000 a year from the soldiers for selling them beer?

Mr. STEELE. Well, if the gentleman will read the whole of the facts in reference to the matter, and if he takes into consideration all of the conditions existing, he would think differently perhaps himself. It does seem, I will admit, an enormous sum to one who is unacquainted with the conditions. But does the gentleman know to what purpose this fund is put?

Mr. MILNES. I do not care what is done with it.

Mr. STEELE (continuing). A band is hired; they have built an amusement hall; have built a church, and have added very many conveniences to the Home. And this matter is controlled not by the Board of Managers, but is controlled by the board of survey—you may call it so—consisting of the governor, the treasurer, and one or perhaps more officers of the Home.

Mr. MILNES. Would it not be a good idea to start a Good Templars' Lodge, to be paid out of the revenues arising out of the same fund?

Mr. STEELE. I can understand, Mr. Speaker, that this seems to be very strange to gentlemen who have not investigated the matter or who do not understand the facts as they exist. But what are we to do? These men will have their beer or liquor. Is it not better to supply it to them in the Homes, where they can be provided for and taken care of and protected from robbery, than to let them go outside and become the prey to any man who chooses to take advantage of their helpless condition when drunk? You will agree with me that it is better to regulate the sale and allow them to have it in the Homes than to allow them to go out and to be robbed at these saloons and drinking halls in other places in the neighborhood of the Home. It is just the difference between whether the Home is to have the profit, and at the same time protect the inmates of the Home, or the grogshop just outside of the Home shall have the profit, with the privilege of robbing the soldier on every pay day. If it is held better—and it is being tried that way at the Marion Home, in which I am particularly interested, that being my own State—it is being tried there; but I want to say, in my opinion, that the control of the men running to saloons outside of the Homes, instead of inside, has not been favorable to the Homes or their discipline.

Mr. MILNES. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to say that in my own State we prohibit the sale of any liquor outside of the Homes, within 1 mile of these institutions.

Mr. STEELE. That is done also in Ohio.

A MEMBER. I believe it is 3 miles here.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. I wish to ask whether any complaint against General Franklin, except for retaining Governor Smith, has been made? I have heard of none.

Mr. STEELE. So far as I know, there is no complaint in any other direction. General Franklin was one of the pioneers of the West. In 1843 he went to Chicago and helped to survey for the harbor. He then went over to Milwaukee for the same purpose, and was the engineer of the first great bridge that spans the Mississippi River, a bridge that has since made it possible for you gentlemen who live in the West to go and come East. At the outbreak of the war he was here as superintendent of the construction of this Capitol and of the Treasury building; then went to the field and performed honorable and gallant services in the cause of the Union. No man will dare to attack his honor, his integrity, or his ability. The only thing against him that I know of at all is his politics; and there is absolutely, let me say, no politics in the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home. I would rather, of course, myself, that he was a Republican. I do not know but that he would be a little better man on that account. But we do not know politics in the Board.

I had occasion to investigate these matters in detail myself, having been a member of the committee that investigated the management of the Homes at Milwaukee and Dayton at the instance of the Democratic House in 1883. They investigated the Homes and raked high and low for something to criticize in the management, and could not find anything, political or otherwise, to complain of, although you would have thought the Democratic party was being raided.

Mr. MILNES. If the gentleman will permit me, one other question. How long has this gentleman, General Smith, been active in this Home?

Mr. STEELE. Since its organization, as far as I know. He went there at the special request of Governor Martin, of Kansas, and was taken from the Togus Home, where he was treasurer.

Mr. MILNES. How long since he took this Keeley cure?

Mr. STEELE. I am unable to say.

Mr. MILNES. Is it true that he has taken the cure to your knowledge under stress of dismissal?

Mr. STEELE. Not at all. It was before I knew him that he took the cure, I think. I had not seen him, excepting once. It was when I was on the Congressional committee at the Togus Home, in 1883.

But, Mr. Speaker, as I said at the beginning, there is so much talk about, and I am so often interrupted, that I lose the run of what I desired to say for the information of the House. I have a letter from Governor Morrill, of Kansas, which I would like to have read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF KANSAS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Governor's Office, April 9, 1896.

MY DEAR STEELE: I promised Governor Smith I would write you in regard to what I knew of the management of the Leavenworth Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. Since I went off of the Board two years ago I have seldom been there, and can say but little from personal knowledge. While a member I was there frequently, and endeavored to keep a close watch of matters. The Home, as you well know, was well managed, and I can not believe there is any foundation for the charges of brutality. The Keeley cure was a grand success, redeeming over a thousand men from intemperate habits. The difference in the Home since the cure was introduced is very marked. My orders were that every man should be left entirely free to take the cure or not, as he pleased, and no one ever intimated to me that he was compelled to take it. I hope you are having a pleasant time.

Yours,

E. N. MORRILL.

Hon. G. W. STEELE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. STEELE. I want to read what Mr. D. R. Anthony said about this Home.

Mr. BLUE. That is not George T. Anthony?

Mr. STEELE. But he is as good a man—the editor of a good paper.

Mr. BLUE. I simply wanted to distinguish.

Mr. STEELE. I will have the letter printed, if there is no objection.

Mr. HULL. You had better have it read.

Mr. STEELE. There is so much of it, it will take too much time. I will print it with other papers.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, KANSAS, March 3, 1896.

SIR: I hereby beg leave to lay before you the following facts in the interest of justice and of the best interests of this Branch Home:

2. I have been, as you know, here for more than nine years—that is, almost from the establishment of this Branch—and have had opportunity of knowing the facts I am about to state.

3. From 1886 up until about three years ago the poor old men who came here were the victims of the saloons, brothels, and thugs who seemed to regard old soldiers as their proper prey.

4. The public highway from Leavenworth to the Home and, indeed, the limits surrounding the Home became infested with disreputable places, where abandoned men and women lay in wait for our people (the old soldiers), especially about pension day.

5. So disgraceful had these conditions become that the respectable men and women of Leavenworth bitterly complained of the sights and sounds and indecent exposures on the part of our drugged and drunken men on the public highway.

6. About three years ago the Board of Managers permitted Colonel Smith to establish a course of treatment for such of our people as had an uncontrollable drink habit and who wished to be cured of it.

The results have been wonderful. More than thirteen hundred men have availed themselves of this treatment. I have personally talked with more than a thousand of them. I have never heard one of them intimate that he had been forced to take the cure, or that he had been injured by it. On the contrary, hundreds of them have told me how thankful they were for it, and how much their general health had been benefited since free from alcoholic disease.

Morally the change in the men has been as marked as it is physically. In the barracks, on the grounds, everywhere, the most wonderful change in the gentlemanly bearing of the men has taken place.

8. Through the efforts of Colonel Smith and the officers and members of the Home who have aided him, many of the vilest places along the highways leading to the Home have been closed.

The sight of drunken men lying on the roadside or making indecent exposures of their persons are almost unknown. Not only are there no longer complaints from citizens about the members of the Home, but, on the other hand, frequent expressions of gratification are heard over the change effected, and the most influential people in business and social circles are very free in their expressions of commendation of Colonel Smith's work as governor of the Home.

On February 18 last, when the Editorial Association of the State of Kansas visited the Home, Col. D. R. Anthony, their chairman, and the editor of the Leavenworth Times, the most influential paper, probably, in Kansas, paid a very glowing tribute to the wonderfully successful management of Col. Andrew J. Smith as governor of this Home.

7. May I, without offense, express the hope that the Board of Managers will not permit any misrepresentations made by designing parties or the enemies of the veteran soldier to influence it so as to put any obstacle in the way of Colonel Smith in this great effort to rescue brave but unfortunate men from the grasp of the insatiable appetite which has brought mental, physical, financial, not to say moral, ruin to so many of our comrades.

Grand as has been Colonel Smith's material management of this Home, when history comes to be written many will believe that his greatest achievement will have been found in the restored health, hopes, and homes of the men, who for the first time in many years have found themselves free from the insatiable thirst for alcoholic stimulants.

Respectfully,

W. J. GILLESPIE,
Protestant Chaplain.

Gen. W. B. FRANKLIN.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME,
Leavenworth County, Kans., February 29, 1896.

GENERAL: In view of certain adverse criticisms of the management of this Western Branch now going the rounds of the press, I have the honor to submit to you my personal experience as testimony in rebuttal of all such attacks, whether emanating from private malice or ill-advised sympathy.

As a Catholic priest living in this community for many years, I feel that I have exceptional opportunities to know the true inwardness of the motives which inspire these attacks. They are base, and in no sense represent the sentiments of our people, either within or without the Home. Among so large a number of old men, bent under physical, mental, and moral infirmity, consequent on old age, it is to be expected that discontent and imaginary wrongs should find a place among their mental feelings. Such a condition of mind, though confined to a few, is of course to be expected, and yet unprincipled lawyers and cynical newspapers use these ravings of decrepitude to defeat authority and breed discontent.

I deem it my duty to lay before you, as president of the Board of Managers, the true state of affairs. With a full sense, therefore, of my position before the public, I make bold to say that the management of this Branch Home is able, humane, and generous to an eminent degree. Order, of course, must be maintained, and the vicious few must be suppressed. On these two points the overwhelming membership of the Home is in full accord. The Keeley treatment is but a means to this end. It has been successful, and successful to an extent that can be measured only by a comparison between the present state of affairs and conditions and the same as existent before its introduction into the Home. I was here before the Western Branch Home was in being. I watched its construction and saw its halls gradually peopled. The bells of our church joined their music to the general shout of joy that filled the air when first you sent us the news—the glorious news—that the Soldiers' Home would be at our gates. We, too, were liberal, as you well know, yet the day quickly came when all good citizens regretted the presence of the Western Branch in their midst, so great was the influx of men and women of low character and intemperate habits. The city authorities had to increase the police force. The sheriff of the county was kept busy long after each pay day, and I honestly believe Governor Smith himself became alarmed. This was some five or six years ago. In April, 1892, the Keeley treatment for alcoholism was introduced, and the gradual improvement in the morals and manners of the drinking class of the Home has given an air of peace and contentment to this Home which it had not known before. The change is very marked, and it certainly proves the efficacy of the treatment.

I am in a position to obtain the very best testimony in regard to this much-talked-of treatment, and I must say that I would show myself indifferent to the best interests of humanity, as well as to the welfare of the veterans of the last war, should I remain silent on this occasion. I am fully convinced that the Keeley League has worked a transformation in this Home; that the treatment has been, on the whole, a gratifying success, and that, what is more to the point, no one to my knowledge has been unduly influenced to take the treatment or to pay the expenses entailed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Gen. W. B. FRANKLIN,
President Board of Managers, N. H. D. V. S.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., March 4, 1896.

STEEL.

DEAR SIR: We are much interested, as we know you are, in the welfare of the National Soldiers' Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. We are especially interested in the Leavenworth Home. Its development and progress have been daily before us.

Gen. William B. Franklin, who, as the commander of the Left Grand Division of the Army of the Potomac, rendered such distinguished service during the war, has held the position of president of the Board of Managers for more than twelve years. We have watched his career and believe his policy to have been good. To his ability, experience, conservative action, and special fitness for the position is due the present excellent condition of all the Homes.

We are convinced that a change in the management at this time would not be for the good of the veterans, and therefore heartily favor his reappointment and urgently request that you will give him your vote and active support.

Very respectfully,

A. Caldwell, president K. Mfg. Co.; Cyrus Townsend, Secretary K. Mfg. Co.; A. J. Tullock, proprietor M. V. B. and I. Works; Paul E. Havens, president Leavenworth National Bank; Edw. Carroll, cashier Leavenworth National Bank; E. W. Snyder, president Manufacturers' National Bank; W. B. Nickels, cashier Manufacturers' National Bank; J. W. Spratley, president Union Savings Bank; E. A. Kelly, cashier Union Savings Bank; H. F. Rush, president the Rush Milling Company; J. S. Rice, James G. Graham, Arthur Simmons, Eitzensohn, Wolfert & Co., department store; I. W. Crancer, of the Crancer Hardware Company; O. B. Taylor, James A. McGonigle, Jno. W. Fogler, vice-president First National Bank; John Kellery, C. B. Brace; E. P. Willson, president Great Western Stove Company; Isur Wilson, president Great Western Manufacturing Company; J. L. Abernathy.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME,
Leavenworth County, Kans., February 23, 1896.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with instructions from Col. Andrew J. Smith, governor of the Western Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, I have the honor to submit my semiannual report of the Keeley Institute of the Western Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, commencing July 1, 1895, and ending December 31, 1895, as follows:

We have treated for chronic alcoholism..... 32
We have treated for other narcotics..... 8

Total..... 40
Total number treated since the establishment of the Keeley method of treating chronic alcoholism..... 1,341
Percentage of lapses..... 23.04
The ages range from 47 to 80 years, making an average age of..... 61.01

Two hundred and six married men have been returned to their families and friends. I have a number of members who have taken the treatment on extra duty in the hospital corps, and am happy to say that they give good satisfaction, and can be trusted to handle liquors as safely as those who have never acquired the taste for liquor. Members whose nervous system was broken and shattered by drink have become strong and able-bodied men, barring age and wounds.

I repeat, as you will observe by referring to my former reports, that the health, happiness, and discipline of the members have been greatly improved by the Keeley treatment. My sick reports show the absence of a single case of delirium tremens treated in the hospital since my appointment as surgeon; and I would still further state that in all the cases treated not a single instance has occurred wherein the health of a member has been impaired by skin treatment.

Great care is exercised in the administration of the remedies, and Asst. burga, A. W. Reese and J. L. Fryer deserve great credit for their kind, careful, and skillful manner of treatment.

I could go further and state the great improvement in the sanitary and moral condition of the members who have taken the treatment. Many of them attend divine services on the Sabbath and conduct themselves in a highly creditable manner; but as this is only a semiannual report, and the items having been referred to in my former annual reports, I am compelled to limit my remarks to a few of the most important facts in explanation of the reason why a less number have been treated during the last six months than at any other time, which is simply owing to the lack of material, as it would seem that almost all of our excessive drinkers have taken the cure and are now sober men, and are using their influence toward the upbuilding of the Home, and by their example many men who have not taken the treatment have discontinued the habit from sheer force of example.

Yours, very respectfully,

Gen. W. B. FRANKLIN,
President Board of Managers, N. H. D. V. S., Hartford, Conn.

D. JONES, Surgeon.

Mr. BLUE. Will you read some extracts from D. R. Anthony's paper within the last few weeks?

Mr. STEELE. I would, if I had the paper, read what is said about that Home.

Mr. BLUE. I will furnish you some extracts.

Mr. STEELE. Now, about the character of the treasurer of the National Home, it was said by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] that this "striker" was taken from the Home. Why, we could take as good business men from these Homes as there are in the country. Until I find that a soldier has done something dishonorable, I count him an honorable man, and no man can point his finger to anything that Major Birmingham has ever done that was not strictly honorable.

He had been assisting the treasurer of the Home for a number of years, and the Board found him to be not only capable, but unusually so, and an honest man; and when these changes were made, as I said before, these people, being out of money, were compelled to act hurriedly. He was carried up to Hartford, Conn., where he was not acquainted with the people at all, his home being in New York, and I do not know that he could have got a bond there instantly, or that he had time to go elsewhere. These men had been without money for a long time, and it was necessary for him to act quickly. I did not know whether the bond had been given to the Board of Managers, as the treasurer's bond had theretofore been given, or not.

I did not understand that when the bond was made, but he came in and said to us, "I have got to make this bond quickly." And he made it to the Secretary of War, as the law prescribed. The Board did not concern themselves about the bond. It was not a matter of concern to us, and, as I said, the details are many. When I said—and the record will bear me out—I could not say just to whom he made the bonds, to what officer of the Government, but that he had made it to the Secretary of War or some other officer, and I understood had been compelled to so make it, and I found out my error the next morning, the first thing I did was to get up and report it.

About the insurance, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] stood here and stated, "as a suspicion almost amounting to a certainty," that the bond was given by this man in a company in which General Franklin was interested, and that the post buildings at various Homes are insured in companies in which General Franklin has a special interest. As a matter of fact, I want to say to you that he has no interest whatever in any insurance companies excepting two—the Orient and the National, both Hartford companies. He has no interest in any security or bond company at all, but he has an interest in those two insurance companies. These post buildings, erected out of money from the post fund, built for the comfort of the men themselves, under officers of the Homes, are insured for $199,200.

There is that much insurance carried on that character of buildings, and these buildings are monuments to show that the money has been properly used, instead of the saloon men getting it, men who would not only make the men drunk, but rob them. As I say, the insurance carried on these buildings amounts to $199,200. Seventy-two policies are carried, and five of those policies are in companies in which General Franklin has an interest—the Orient and the National. He has 89 shares in the National and 80 shares in the Orient. In the Orient, in which he has 80 shares, there is carried $6,500 of this $199,200, and in the National, in which he has 89 shares, there is carried $3,000. So, out of the total insurance carried on these Homes, amounting to $199,200, there are policies aggregating $9,500 in companies in which General Franklin has some interest.

Two of those policies are on buildings at the Maine Home, and when the governor telegraphed me he telegraphed that General Franklin had no interest in any company insuring those buildings, so far as he knew, and I do not think he had. He was not aware that he had any interest in the Orient. So that my friend from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] would better look a little to statements that he makes, especially when he makes statements of that kind, and assails the character of an honorable man.

I do not feel that it is just to the House that I should detain you longer. I feel that I have covered the ground tolerably well for me, although when I come to look over my remarks I shall doubtless find myself embarrassed, because I have left out many things that I should like to say.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. What about the regular soldiers who were admitted to the Home at the same time that volunteer soldiers who were entitled to admission were refused admission?

Mr. HULL. I should like to hear you on that?

Mr. STEELE. I will find out about that to-night if I can. I am not prepared to give an answer on that subject now.

Mr. HULL. Telegraph out there.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question?

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. It seems to be universally conceded that this man was drunk all through the war frequently; that he is a drunkard; and I want to ask you if you propose to keep this drunkard at the head of that institution when you have found out that he is a drunkard?

Mr. STEELE. What drunkard is that?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. This Mr. Smith, who is complained of by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE].

Mr. POOLE. I should like to answer that question.

Mr. STEELE. I will answer that question. As one of the Managers of the Home, I will say to you that if I have a vote and I should find that Mr. Smith had been drunk one single time since he has taken the Keeley cure I would not only vote against retaining him, but I would do all I could against retaining him. I do not believe he has been drunk once since he has taken that cure.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Is there any evidence that would convince you that he was drunk? Can there be any produced, of any nature, that would convince you?

Mr. POOLE. I can answer that, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] has asked a question of the gentleman from Indiana, if the Managers of the National Soldiers' Homes would allow this man, whom he says was drunk before the war and drunk during the war, and has been drunk since, would be allowed to remain as governor of the Home. Perhaps I am the only man here who can speak from personal knowledge of Col. Andrew J. Smith. I knew him when a boy. I knew him when we were in the Army together. We have slept under the same blanket and drank from the same canteen. I have had more experience with him than any other associate I know of on this floor, and I can say of my own knowledge that that man never was drunk during the war; and any man who makes that charge here can not prove it. He may have been under the influence of liquor while in Kansas, but that is a prohibition State, and I am not responsible for that. [Laughter.] But I will say, Mr. Speaker, that Colonel Smith was as gallant a soldier and as true a man as ever went into the service. I would like, if the gentleman from Indiana will allow me, to say a few words on this subject.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Indiana will permit you to go ahead on this.

Mr. POOLE. While this is up—

Mr. BLUE. I want permission to submit a question to you—

Mr. POOLE (continuing). I know something about the management of Soldiers' Homes.

Mr. BLUE. I want permission to ask you a question.

Mr. POOLE. All right.

Mr. BLUE. This A. J. Smith is not the celebrated A. J. Smith of the war?

Mr. POOLE. This A. J. Smith was formerly adjutant of the One hundred and twenty-second New York Volunteers, and afterwards assistant adjutant-general of the Third Division of the Sixth Army Corps, afterwards assistant adjutant-general of Hancock's Veteran Corps of the Army of the Potomac.

Mr. BLUE. You have not answered my question.

Mr. POOLE. I do not know what you mean, then.

Mr. BLUE. That was not Gen. A. J. Smith?

Mr. POOLE. That is another man entirely.

Mr. BLUE. One further question.

Mr. POOLE. I am referring to the man who is now the governor of the Soldiers' Home at Leavenworth, Kans.

Mr. BLUE. This is not Gen. A. J. Smith.

Mr. POOLE. This is not Gen. A. J. Smith, of Missouri. It is another man.

Mr. BLUE. In regard to this man that you are now speaking of—you say you know him?

Mr. POOLE. I know him.

Mr. BLUE. Was not he a member of General Franklin's staff?

Mr. POOLE. He was not.

Mr. BLUE. Are you sure of that?

Mr. POOLE. I am sure. He knew General Franklin. We served together in the Sixth Army Corps, and General Franklin commanded the Left Grand Division of the Army of the Potomac in the Fredericksburg campaign, which included the Sixth Army Corps, and Colonel Smith undoubtedly knew General Franklin then; and I will say further that there was no army officer in the Army of the Potomac better known to General Grant and General Sheridan than Col. A. J. Smith. He was a good soldier and a brave man. He was also a true man and a good man to his comrades and had as kindly an interest for the men of his regiment as any man I have ever known.

Mr. BLUE. What did you and he drink when you drank out of the canteen together?

Mr. POOLE. We drank cold water. There is no one here but would know that I did not drink liquor with him. Any man who knows me knows well my habits in that regard. These charges that have been made against Col. A. J. Smith of being a "brute" and a "drunkard" are unfair. You can not prove them. In that connection, I know something about the management of these Soldiers' Homes, and I know that such charges are often made by the inmates. Some years ago I was one of a committee that was sent to examine the Soldiers' Home at Bath, N. Y. Charges were made at that time against the manager of the Home. The governor, General Pitcher, was an old officer of the Regular Army, and yet these charges were made against him as strong as these charges are made against Col. Andrew J. Smith. We went over to the Home and remained there two or three weeks, taking the testimony of the witnesses, and there were a great many of them. We had something over 100 witnesses sworn, and the result of our investigation was briefly this: We recommended that every man who made the charges against General Pitcher should be expelled.

And I want to say right here that you can convict the officers of any poorhouse or Soldiers' Home or any institution of that kind in this country if you listen to all the charges that would be made by the inmates of those Homes. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, a good many men who get into those Homes are drunkards.

Mr. BLUE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POOLE. Certainly.

Mr. BLUE. If Andrew J. Smith is such a gentleman now and drank nothing but cold water, why on earth did he take the Keeley cure?

Mr. POOLE. There were times when he drank liquor.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I understand that this Gen. A. J. Smith was not the gentleman you describe. That has been the general understanding all over the House, and that is why I asked you the question.

Mr. POOLE. Now, I admit that Colonel Smith, at times during the war and since, drank liquor; but he had the manhood, when he found it was injuring him, to take the Keeley cure. He is an enthusiast in all he does; and when he had taken that cure and found its benefits, it was not surprising that he went around among the men under his charge and induced these men to take it. I am glad to see that 1,300 men under his influence took the Keeley cure and have become good citizens once more. It is not surprising that the other men who did not take that cure should find fault with the men who saved themselves from being common drunkards. It is not an unusual thing. I have served with Colonel Smith in battle; I have seen him under almost all circumstances, and I never saw him under the influence of liquor. He was a gallant soldier during the war, and I can not believe to-day that he is unjust to any of his old comrades.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to offer an amendment and have it pending. I may speak to it when the proper time comes.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. Whereas charges of drunkenness and brutality to inmates of the Home and mismanagement have been made against Col. Andrew J. Smith, governor of the Home at Leavenworth, Kans., the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House shall appoint a commission of three persons, two of whom shall be members of the House and one a member of the Senate, to investigate said charges and file a report of their finding with the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers of the United States. If a majority of the commission find that said Col. Andrew J. Smith was guilty of said charges, or of either of them, the said Board of Managers shall forthwith remove him as governor of said Home and appoint some suitable person to fill said position. Five thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of said investigation. The commission shall have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order on that. The proposition is entirely out of the line of such things. The President is a member of that Board, so is the Secretary of War ex officio, and so is the Chief Justice, and I do not want a committee appointed by a part of the Board.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman desires to reserve the point of order.

Mr. BLUE. I desire to reserve the point of order.

Mr. STEELE. I simply wish to say that we welcome investigation.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall not occupy five minutes, because I simply desire to place myself on record in defense of a distinguished citizen of my State, a gentleman who stands as high in the public estimation as probably any other citizen of Connecticut. General Franklin is not a native of that State. He came to Connecticut soon after the war of the rebellion, and after the death of Colonel Colt took charge of the Colt Firearms Company and managed it most successfully, winning the admiration and respect of the people of his adopted State. He has been connected with many business enterprises in Hartford and elsewhere in the State, and his standing has been such that he could have any position he would accept. General Franklin does not belong to the political party which I represent, but he has been repeatedly requested to accept office, and he has once or twice headed the Democratic electoral ticket, and has been otherwise honored by the political party with which he has been affiliated. The utter puerility of the charges that are made here against General Franklin may be understood and properly appreciated, I think, from the fact that one criticism made upon him is that he, or the managers of the Soldiers' Home, in the exercise of a wise discretion, allowed the insuring of the property connected with the Homes in Hartford companies. I understand from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that some $200,000 of insurance is carried on the property of the different Homes.

Mr. STEELE. One hundred and ninety-nine thousand two hundred dollars.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it would not be possible to get $200,000 of good insurance without going to the city of Hartford for it. [Laughter.] The companies with which General Franklin is connected are among the best in the world. I will guarantee that there has been no extra commission paid, and I submit that it is perfectly legitimate for him or for the Board of Managers to place their insurance in the Hartford companies, because those companies are the best in the country. I do not think this fact reflects at all upon the management or upon General Franklin, and if that charge is a fair indication of the seriousness of the other charges that are made, as I believe it is, I do not think this attack upon General Franklin is worthy of the attention of this House.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I will ask the gentleman whether it is not the fact that General Franklin is even now connected with a number of important business concerns in which he is actively engaged?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Yes, sir; he is connected with one or two fire insurance companies, and he is also vice-president of the Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company, and, in fact, he is connected with many of the leading business enterprises of Hartford.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. And he devotes himself very actively to that business?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I have never known any business with which General Franklin has been connected that has suffered. His management of the Colt factory for a long term of years was very successful, and the same can be said of all his business associations.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. And he devotes himself to that outside business?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That is his reputation. General Franklin neglects nothing that he undertakes, and I do not believe that in his connection with the Soldiers' Home he has neglected any duty.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STOWD of North Carolina, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SHUFORD, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LEONARD, for ten days, on account of important business.

The motion of Mr. HULL was then agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

ADDITIONAL BUILDING FOR NATIONAL MUSEUM.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the time of the Senate long enough to place on record some facts in relation to the necessity for a new building for the National Museum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont, in pursuance of previous notice, calls up from the table a bill which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 696) to provide for the erection of an additional fireproof building for the National Museum, reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, when the Smithsonian Institution, designed for "the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," was put into practical operation it was discovered that a National Museum would be a large contributor to the great purpose of the founder, and that the nation was destitute of such an institution. The Smithsonian building accordingly early began to be temporarily crowded with many gifts and objects of rare value, and subsequently a separate building for a museum was found to be indispensable. Patronized as was this collateral enterprise of the Smithsonian by the Government, through many of its Executive Departments, and guided by the Smithsonian Institution in a scientific and educational direction, as well as in the practical diffusion of knowledge, it was sure to become an important, but inexpensive institution of public education, with a constantly increasing collection of important materials worthy to be intrusted to the custody of a national museum, where they might be forever preserved and thus increase in value with every succeeding generation.

The statistics in relation to the present Museum are interesting, and indicate its extensive scope and character. It is not a "dime museum" of grotesque curiosities, but without money and without price it offers to visitors more wonderful attractions by its many specimens of rare scientific and historic value. The several States are represented by a great variety of contributions of special interest, and if they were represented by many more their wealth of materials would be in no danger of being exhausted.

There are now 3,406,920 specimens in the Museum, many of almost priceless value, and it is even claimed that a fair appraisal of the value of the entire collection would make it amount to several millions of dollars.

A museum has been properly defined as "a consultation library of objects," and our National Museum justifies this definition, as it may be said to be thronged by an inquisitive people daily asking questions, and here seeking proper answers. It is visited by those who are students in various branches of science and by those who are not students, but all find it an object lesson. It is a free school, the benefits of which are annually extended to multitudes of visitors from almost every State and Territory of the Union. All who pass through the door of the old or new building are registered, and the total number for the past nine years was 3,474,056, or an average of nearly 400,000 annually.

This shows that the average daily number of those who have found pleasure and instruction in visiting the National Museum for the past nine years to have been over 1,000 per day, except Sundays. They come from distant States as well as from those near by. Those who live not far from Niagara are said to be content with its roar and rarely visit the great falls. It is the multitude of American travelers from distant homes who have most pride in and seek the most profit from the National Museum.

The correspondence of the Museum amounts to 20,000 letters annually, and as largely comes from remote as the nearest States, perpetually asking for or giving special information.

In 1879 the present Museum building was authorized to be constructed, at a cost of \$250,000, and was completed for that sum. It was, I believe, roughly planned by General Meigs. The interior of the building is appropriate for its use, while the exterior has won less commendation. Although it covers $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres of ground, another building of equal or larger dimensions is already an urgent necessity.

The additional building will be placed west of the Smithsonian, and occupy there a like space and position with that on the east side of the Smithsonian, but will be one story higher, and with a cellar. The cost will be something more, of course, than was that of the present building, but it will be built with the same strict economy as was the first.

The great lack of room for the proper exhibition of gifts, or of any materials collected for the Museum, tends to retard its proper growth and value. A large additional amount of room is greatly needed to illustrate the natural wealth of our country, of which many more specimens deserve to be gathered and all classified by States. The minerals, marbles, and building stones of some of our States are now fairly represented, but a better and more complete collection might be obtained from many more of them.

The congested and present crowded condition of the Museum is visible, of course, to all who enter it; but I do not suppose that members of Congress can be generally aware of the great amount of material which has been already collected, prepared, and labeled, with much labor, that has been boxed up and is now stored away in various odd places, uninsured, and entirely hidden from view. Some of these materials have been temporarily in the lecture room, and many out-of-the-way corners are also thus monopolized.

Some valuable materials, for want of room to receive them, have been and are now in the basement of the museum of Yale College. The great herbarium, the most important collection of American plants in the world, has to be stored at present by the Agricultural Department.

In the basement of the Smithsonian Institution and in its towers a space equal to 200,000 cubic feet is crowded to the utmost extent with boxed and labeled material. In one basement room are packed 50,000 skins of birds, and 50,000 more are in the gallery, and it must be remembered that we have the most beautiful and the widest collection of birds of any country in the world.

There are various sheds in scattered places and one temporarily hired, with an estimated capacity of 170,000 cubic feet, fully packed with valuable material. None of these ephemeral structures containing numberless objects of interest are fireproof, and all are dangerously combustible.

It is now just a half century since the establishment of the Smithsonian Institution, and its work has been a continuous honor to the United States. It is the custodian of the National Museum, which is the only lawful place of deposit of "all objects of art and of foreign and curious research, and all objects of natural history, plants, and geological and mineralogical specimens belonging to the United States."

The idea has been suggested that possibly it might have been wiser to have originally selected a site where a much larger structure for the Museum could have been erected; but its removal from the neighborhood of the Smithsonian building would have made it impracticable for Secretary Baird, in whom Congress reposed the utmost confidence, to have had anything to do with it, and far less to have been the persistent and efficient guide and promoter of a great national museum, as much to his personal honor as even the national fish hatchery has proved to be.

The additional building now earnestly sought will be equal to the preservation and exhibition of a very large amount of accumulated material now unhappily stored away, and will also provide some space for future accumulations that should not longer be neglected.

The agents of great museums abroad are reported to be regularly employed here, with authority to purchase any American curios and antiquities, and in some directions they are supposed to have already obtained better specimens for exhibition than have been left for us to find.

The New World, of which the United States forms so important a part, in its prairies and mountains, hills and forests, with their extensive minerals, rocks, and marbles, lakes and rivers, with the animals, game, birds, and fish, the story of the prehistoric race, the legends of the Indian tribes, as well as the notable modern history and life of the present inhabitants, all seem to have distinctive features of their own which belong almost exclusively to the western half of the globe discovered by Columbus. This vast and comparatively ungathered continental field, with its abounding American treasures, should be harvested by our National Museum and not surrendered to the more diligent foreign explorers to adorn and enrich only European museums.

As long as it shall be conducted by the Smithsonian Institution its broad nonpartisan reputation as a national museum of the highest character will not be likely ever to be disputed or impeached.

While this additional building, with its additional story and cellar, will more than double the capacity of the present museum, it is probable as the years go by that it will be necessary to keep step with the research, progress, and record of the American people, and as early as 1926, when our population will be not less than 140,000,000, it may be expected that another and grander building in the rear of the Smithsonian, facing on South B street and connecting the two wings, will be required to mark and illustrate the age.

I ask that Senate bill 698, which is on the table, be now placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill concerning which the Senator from Vermont has addressed the Senate be put upon its passage at this time. I know it is a bill to which no Senator objects.

Mr. MORRILL. I prefer that an amendment of the same character shall be put on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the bill could be passed through the Senate and go to the other House.

Mr. MORRILL. I would rather keep the bill back for the present.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, February 18, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor yesterday afternoon, in order that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] might move an executive session, I had hoped I was approaching the conclusion of such argument as I have been able to present to the Senate in regard to the questions that have been raised in this interesting discussion as to admitting Col. Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate. I thought I had shown that the plain provisions of the constitution of Delaware made it necessary that the speaker of the senate, who exercised the office of governor, should retain his office both as speaker of the senate and as senator from the county that he in part represented; that there not only was no express provision of the constitution creating a vacancy in the contingency that was provided for, but every implication from the language used and every intendment to be gathered from the various provisions of the constitution pointed to the fact that no such vacancy was contemplated as possible. I also, I thought, disposed of the argument that was founded upon the two prohibitory clauses, or the two clauses prescribing qualifications, or rather disqualifications, for senator and representative and also for governor. I think it is admitted on both sides that if the mere exercise of the office can be argued to create a vacancy, those clauses do not apply. I think I showed also that by the universal practice and usage in the State and all branches of the Government and in the opinion of all its people no vacancy was created in the numerous instances in which the speaker of the senate had been called to exercise the office of governor.

But the counsel have two branches to their argument, and forced by the stress, it seems to me, of the situation in which they find themselves, they invent a phrase, "suspension from office," that is, that though there is no vacancy when the speaker exercises the office of governor he is suspended for the time being from his legislative function as senator.

Mr. President, I dwell upon the fact that there is no such phrase in the constitution as "suspension from office"; that the thing itself is not provided for and is at war with the whole scheme of the constitution; that it would produce a state of things much more inconvenient and much worse for the people of the State than to create a vacancy, for if you create a vacancy it can be filled, but if you create a suspension you create a sort of vacancy that can not be filled, and thereby leave one-third of the representation of a county destroyed without possibility of supplying it—a state of things which it is not conceivable that the framers of the constitution ever intended or would have permitted if it had been called to their attention.

Suppose, as I said yesterday, that the framers of the constitution had had suggested to them in their convention that when, under the provisions that they had framed, the speaker of the senate exercised the office of governor the speaker was suspended from his function as senator, thereby creating a vacancy that could not be filled, and that one-third of the representation of a county had thus been helplessly destroyed, the answer would have been (and I think no intelligent man will suggest that it could have been other) that we do not think we have done this thing, and we certainly never intended to do it.

This suspension is claimed to have been worked on an entirely independent ground from the prohibitory clauses, so called, of the constitution, or the qualification clauses on what they call an inherent incompatibility between the executive and legislative offices, and a so-called American doctrine of public law has been invoked, which is said to be founded upon the division of the three departments of the Government in American constitutions into executive, legislative, and judicial. I have asserted that there is no such American doctrine. It has been demonstrated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in his admirable argument that no such doctrine ever existed or has ever been declared by any writer on constitutional law. I read yesterday from Story on the Constitution, I read from Mr. Webster's speeches, and I also read from Mr. Madison in the Federalist to show that there was no such doctrine, and I think I have so shown, the doctrine being merely that one department shall not exercise the whole of the powers of the other department, not that there may not be an occasional participation of those who hold position or office in one in the exercise of the powers of the other. A legislator, a senator or representative, is not the legislative department. A legislator is not the general assembly; he is only one constituent factor of it. He can not exert legislative power, though the body to which he belongs can. He is not one of the great departments, and when he exercises an executive function it is not the legislative department participating in an executive function, but it is a single unit of those composing the legislative department performing some duties that may properly be called executive. That is all there is of it; and it has been shown that that is a thing that has not been avoided in any constitutions of the forty-five States of the American Union. I assert that without fear of contradiction.

To show how utterly untenable the theory of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] is, and upon which he built his whole argument, it seems to me, we all recollect—certainly every lawyer recollects—that in the State of New York until 1849, I think it was, the supreme appellate tribunal of that State was composed of the lieutenant-governor, certain judges, and the senate, one of the members of the legislative department, and that the senate of New York through a large period of the history of that Empire State was performing judicial functions. No one thought that any American system was being trampled under foot when that constitution was in force, and no one ever dreamed to assert that the framers of that constitution were not imbued with a knowledge of what was required of those who were undertaking to create a framework of government for a free American Commonwealth.

It is not worth while that I should pause to ransack our history for instances so multiplied as they have been, but we can recall without effort the fact that Chief Justice Marshall was Secretary of State when he was commissioned as Chief Justice. He was commissioned in January, 1801, and continued to act as Secretary of State until the end of Mr. Adams's Administration. I have never heard that the great American principle of division of governmental powers was destroyed or seriously impaired by that historical fact.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Did he exercise both offices at the same time?

Mr. GRAY. Both offices at the same time.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He exercised both?

Mr. GRAY. He exercised both.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask whether he exercised the function of Secretary of State and Chief Justice at the same time?

Mr. GRAY. He did. After sitting in court he went to his office of Secretary of State and signed commissions, and made communication with foreign powers as Secretary of State.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will refer to the authority.

Mr. GRAY. I have it not here, but if it will gratify the Senator I will have that matter made clear for him.

Mr. GEORGE. You are referring to Chief Justice Marshall?

Mr. GRAY. To Chief Justice Marshall.

Mr. TURPIE. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. GRAY. There is no doubt of it. So all that we can do is to agree with the proposition of Mr. Webster, that when we want to find how much participation is permitted by the members of one department of the Government in the powers or duties of another we have got to look to the written Constitution, and that there is no such general American doctrine as that declared by the Senator from New Hampshire. I am just reminded that Chief Justice Jay, after he was Chief Justice, and while he exercised the office of Chief Justice, performed a very important executive act when, under the commission of the President, he made the treaty of commerce with Great Britain of 1795.

Mr. President, we are too practical a people, we are sprung from a people who are too practical, we have inherited our laws and our constitutional tendencies from a people who are too practical, to be bound down in this practical matter of constitution making by any hard-and-fast theory such as the Senator from New Hampshire declared existed. When we want to make a government we consider the object we have in view, the convenience of the provisions that we have made, and the machinery that we have created for the end we had before us.

But, Mr. President, the argument of incompatibility on this foundation of discrimination between legislative and executive functions, as incompatibility for any other cause, will work a vacancy if it works anything, not a suspension. There has been no case cited by the learned Senator from Oregon, whose powers of research and industry we are all familiar with—there has been no case cited in which the taking or acceptance of an incompatible office has worked anything but a vacancy in the office already held. There is nowhere, so far as I know (and certainly the distinguished Senator has cited no instance), where incompatibility has been adjudged to work any effect at all upon the office already held that that effect has not been the creation of a vacancy and not of a suspension. The suspension of function is a thing that must be provided for by express constitutional or statutory enactment. It can not in its nature be a thing that works its own creation. It is a limited and special and extraordinary effect to be produced, where it is produced at all; and it can not be argued that such an effect would follow the mere incompatibility of office, if incompatibility existed.

But, Mr. President, there is another view to be taken of the argument of the Senator from Oregon and those who agree with him and have followed him. He says upon this ground, independently of all others, incompatibility of function, there is a suspension worked in the position of speaker of the senate and senator from Kent County, in the State of Delaware, in the special case we have before us. If it is an incompatibility of function that creates this suspension, and not express constitutional enactment and declaration, then the suspension can only exist pro tanto; it can only exist, according to the Senator's own argument, so far as that incompatibility extends, because there is no other way by which the Senator can logically arrive at the conclusion that there has been a suspension by reason of inherent incompatibility between these two offices, except by arguing that there is a common law which forbids two incompatible functions to be exercised at the same time by the same man. Well, admitting, then, for the sake of argument, that the legislative function is incompatible with the executive function, and that therefore there was worked a suspension on that account of the legislative function so far as Mr. Watson was concerned while he exercised the office of governor, the matter we are concerned with here and now is not a legislative function at all; it is the electoral function that he was performing when he voted for United States Senator on the 9th day of May, 1895, and had no relation at all to the legislative duties that were prescribed by the constitution, had no relation at all to the great fundamental character that he held as a legislator; but was a function imposed upon him by the Constitution of the United States, and bore no semblance at all to a legislative function. Therefore this function of voting for a United States Senator was outside of this domain of incompatibility, and could not have been affected by it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Delaware if it is not a fact that Mr. Watson could only exercise the electoral function in virtue of the right existing in him at the same time to exercise the legislative function; and if the right to exercise the legislative function was suspended, does it not follow, as a matter of course, that the right to exercise the electoral function was suspended at the same time?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I think I understand the Senator. But the Senator has made an exceedingly artificial argument on this whole matter of suspension of function occasioned or worked out by the incompatibility of another function. It is true that Mr. Watson was elected a member of the legislature of Delaware, and that, as a member of the legislature of Delaware properly and duly elected, he had a right to participate in the election of a United States Senator. Now, if his exercise of the office of governor, according to the Senator's real belief, worked a vacancy in his office, that was an end of Mr. Watson as a legislator, and he had no right to participate in the election of a United States Senator any more than if he had been expelled by a vote of the senate from that body. But that is not this case; that is not that plain, simple case that plain people can understand. We are dealing with this exceedingly complex situation which the Senator from Oregon has created for the purposes of his argument, to wit, that there was no vacancy created in the senate of Delaware such as I have described by the exercise of the executive office, but there was a suspension of function. He remained senator, or otherwise his place could have been filled, but he could not vote because, forsooth, he was performing executive duties under the constitution—could not vote on a law, could not do anything that was required of him as a legislator. Why? Because his office had been vacated? No. As I said just now, it had not been vacated. But because the legislative function was incompatible with the executive function, and just so far as that incompatibility extended his power and capacity as a legislator was in a state of paralysis. I do not know how else to describe it. But when we come to a function that was not within the four corners of this carefully described incompatible function, to wit, voting for a United States Senator, he still had been elected, his office was not vacant; it was only suspended, according to the Senator's own argument, as to its legislative side, and he was bound to exercise the electoral function of voting for a United States Senator for which he was elected among other things to exercise. That is all there is in that. Otherwise the argument founded upon incompatibility of function or suspension of office, it seems to me, is one that is self-contradictory and illogical.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, he is getting a little bit away from the proposition he was arguing a moment ago. The Senator assumes, for the sake of the argument—that is, for the time being—that my contention was correct to the effect that the right to exercise the function of legislator was suspended while Mr. Watson exercised the office of governor; and then went on to argue that, although that might be so, still Mr. Watson had a right to exercise the electoral function, which was not suspended. I replied to that, for the purposes of showing that that is not a sound argument, by stating that he could only exercise the electoral function in virtue of the right residing in him to exercise the legislative function; and whenever the right to exercise the legislative function was held in abeyance or suspended, then, as a matter of course, it necessarily follows that the right to exercise the electoral function was also suspended, and therefore it follows still furthermore that that particular argument of the Senator from Delaware is not, in my judgment, a good one.

Mr. GRAY. That particular argument of the Senator from Oregon is not a good one. That is all there is about it. Governments could not be run, of course, upon such an attenuated interpretation of constitutions as the Senator feels it necessary to make in this case, in order to establish this incompatibility of function. I agree to that; but I am taking his argument as he has made it, and I have shown that, by its own terms, he arrives at a point where he must admit, if he is logical in that respect, that participation by Mr. Watson in the election of a United States Senator was the exercise of a function that was not incompatible with the exercise of the office of governor. That is what we are dealing with here. We are not talking about his right to vote in the enactment of a law or to perform any purely legislative function. All we are concerned with is whether he, in participating in that joint assembly on the 9th of May, transcended the right that must belong to him in order to permit him to so participate. The Senator says no, because the legislative function is incompatible with the executive function. We say this is not a legislative function, but an electoral function. Then the Senator replies: "Oh, no; I have suspended him; no constitution has done it; no other case in the whole broad area of the United States has done so; but I have suspended him as a legislator, and therefore his right to participate in the election of a United States Senator, which is attendant upon his character as a legislator, is suspended also."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is so.

Mr. GRAY. But how has the Senator suspended him? Not by his own ipse dixit, although I am afraid if we analyze his argument it comes down to that—not by his own ipse dixit, not because he ought to be suspended according to any view that the learned Senator might have of what the proper constitution ought to be, but he has suspended him by asserting that there was an incompatibility between two functions which he was elected to perform, to pass laws and the executive function.

Mr. ALLEN. That is an ipse dixit.

Mr. GRAY. Yes. Granting, for the sake of the argument, that that is what he founded it upon, now in the absence of any constitutional provision establishing such a state of things, in the absence, too, of any authority, any precedent, anywhere from Maine to Georgia or from Massachusetts to California, any instance in American public law—in the absence of all that, I say, we must confine his argument, then, to the incompatibility between two functions that works a suspension, and say that as to a function that is not incompatible, that suspension thus produced can not exist. That is all that can be made of it, taking his own argument, and that is all I meant to do. Where the reason of the law ceases the law itself ceases.

No, Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan felt that this artificial argument and this phrase invented by him would have to be supported, and as he supported it, by ingenious argument, and by not one syllable of authority, although he said the instances were numerous. I challenge him now to make good the proffer that there are numerous instances in the history of the United States where a suspension was worked, such as he has asserted exists here, independently of express constitutional or statutory provisions. The Senator does not reply, and I take it for granted that neither his research nor industry has been able to discover a single such instance, any more than I have been able to do so, or the learned and able Senators who have preceded me in this argument have been able to discover a single instance of such suspension thus worked.

So we come back to the original plain proposition, the exercise of the executive office by the speaker of the senate either worked a vacancy or there was no vacancy of any kind. It certainly did not work a vacancy that it was impossible to fill.

Mr. President, I think I have said enough on that point, but let me add to the authorities which have been already cited by me, going back a little, as to this matter of what is American public law in regard to the division of the three great departments of the Government, and see whether I was right or the Senator from New Hampshire was right in his declaration of what that public law was. I read from Story on the Constitution; I read from Mr. Webster, the great expounder of the Constitution, in one of the most interesting speeches he ever made; I read from Mr. Madison in the Federalist; and now let me come down to modern times, and take a late writer on constitutional law, Mr. Pomeroy. At section 173, in the first part of his work on constitutional law, he says, after quoting the several articles establishing the three departments:

This language is clear, precise, and apparently without exception or limitation. Yet when we compare it with other clauses of the Constitution we shall discover that the separation of functions is not thus perfect; that the several departments are not thus absolutely independent of each other. Indeed, such an ideal independence is impracticable. While the classes of functions committed to the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary may be generally or in the mass distinct, there must be, in the very nature of things, some points of contact, some overlapping, some commingling.

But, Mr. President, as I said at the outset, all this argument in regard to what is the proper construction of the constitution of Delaware and the proper interpretation of the clause by virtue of which Mr. Watson, as speaker of the senate, exercised the office of governor is a work of supererogation. It has been indulged in here by me at great length, I admit, because I considered it proper to vindicate the action of the authorities of my State before the Senate of the United States, and to demonstrate absolutely the propriety of the conduct of the governor of Delaware in his participation in the election for a United States Senator on the 9th of May, 1895. It had been abundantly demonstrated before by the able and distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] that this interpretation of the constitution put upon it by the governor and his advisers was correct; and I have endeavored to repeat it, even with the peril of weakening the argument by my repetition of it. But, after all, it is not necessary that the Senate should burden itself with this argument. What we have to consider here, and what is conclusive of this case, is the proposition that the Senate of the United States has no right, power, or jurisdiction to decide as to the qualifications of a senator who voted on the 9th of May for the election of a United States Senator from Delaware—absolutely none—and we shall stultify ourselves, Mr. President, we shall reverse the precedents of a hundred years in this body, if we shall allow ourselves, from whatever motive, to step down from the high plane we should occupy in exercising this high judicial function to usurp the duty of the senate of Delaware to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. Unless we recognize that right in the two houses of the State legislatures, it is in vain that we should demand respect for the exercise that we make of a similar power given to us. We ought to be very careful not to transcend in the exercise of this power the proper and appropriate judicial function that has been conferred upon us by the Constitution of the United States. The senate of Delaware, and not the Senate of the United States, is to judge of the qualifications of William T. Watson to sit in the senate of Delaware while temporarily exercising the office of governor.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon, of course, is too able and too learned a man not to admit that proposition; but with the exceeding ingenuity which has characterized his argument through all the branches of this case, he seeks to evade or avoid the force of that proposition by setting up some other one, which he thinks will carry him around the inhibition which is implied upon the Senate of the United States to exercise the judicial function of the senate of Delaware. Having assumed a suspension of function—a pure assumption, as I have shown, nowhere warranted by the constitution or any respectable authority anywhere, outside of express statutory enactment or constitutional enactment—having assumed a suspension of function and created a phrase and a condition for which there is no constitutional warrant, the Senator builds up upon this assumption the further proposition that there was so seat subject or open to occupancy in the Delaware senate as to which the judicial power of that senate could be exercised, and upon this proposition, thus established, he proceeds to show by the Kansas case—from which the suggestion, I suppose, of a seat not subject to occupancy, although the phrase did not come from there, was given to the Senator's mind—that the Delaware senate has no jurisdiction to judge in regard to this matter, but that the Senate of the United States has. That is a very remarkable proposition, to commence with. The Senator says under that clause of the constitution of Delaware which it has in common with all the constitutions of the States and of the United States, that each house shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, that it has only the right to judge of the act of the election and return, of the fact of the qualification or disqualification, but if there is any admixture of law or constitutional interpretation necessary to the adjudication of the case, then the senate of Delaware has no right to determine it, but the Senate of the United States has. How monstrous that proposition sounds when you state it, and yet that is the proposition!

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not contend that the senate of Delaware have not the right to decide it. I said they did have the right to decide it in the first instance, but that their decision, if they misconstrue the constitution of the State of Delaware, was not binding upon the Senate of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, there is no such power as that suggested by the Senator from Oregon conferred upon either house of the Delaware legislature by its constitution, or upon the houses of any legislature by any constitution, to judge in the first instance. Think of it! The only power is to determine finally. That is what "judge" means. Look at Worcester's Dictionary or any other good dictionary. I ask that a dictionary be brought to me. What does the word "judge" mean in those clauses? It means, or it means nothing, to determine finally the question; and to judge in the first instance is not to determine finally. What sort of a privilege or a prerogative is that to the houses of a legislature, that they may judge, it is true, as in an inferior jurisdiction, but that that judgment is subject to reversal, subject to be set aside? I ask the Senator from Mississippi to read from Worcester's Dictionary—I see he has it—just what the word "judge" means.

Mr. GEORGE read as follows:

To examine and decide as a judge; to determine finally.

Mr. GRAY. "To determine finally." What sort of a jurisdiction is that which is conferred according to the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon? That would be a futile jurisdiction; it would not answer the purpose for which it was given. What says the Senator from Oregon to a jurisdiction given to the Senate of the United States under a similar clause to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members? Is it to judge in the first instance only, subject to be reversed in the Supreme Court or the circuit court of the United States, or wherever the question might come collaterally or directly before a judicial tribunal?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will simply say that the Senate of the United States is the highest court in the United States of that kind.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon, having once strayed from the beaten path of constitutional law, has wandered farther and farther into the jungle of misinterpretation—I was going to say ignorance, but I can not use that word in connection with the Senator—of the fundamental principle, as it seems to me, of American constitutions. Sir, if there is one position that we have been taught in the hornbooks of constitutional law in regard to this dual Government of ours it is that there is no inferiority and no superiority of the one as to the other from the beginning to the end of that scheme. Each is absolutely terres, atque rotundus in its own sphere, and is inferior to no other jurisdiction created by man.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Delaware a question?

Mr. GRAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Delaware seems to treat very lightly the position I assume on this question. I should like to test his argument by asking him a question. The constitution of the State of Delaware says in plain terms that the senate of the State of Delaware shall consist of 9 members. Suppose the senate of the State of Delaware should admit a tenth man?

Mr. GRAY. I will come to that directly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And should admit him to a seat, pass upon his qualifications, allow him to vote, and a Senator of the United States was elected, and the tenth man gave the casting vote which secured his election, would the Senator from Delaware contend that in virtue of the clause of the Delaware constitution empowering the senate of the State of Delaware to pass upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, its decision in that case would bind the Senate of the United States? Would he contend that we were concluded—that we had not the right here ourselves finally to construe the constitution of the State of Delaware as to the number of senators who constituted the senate of the State of Delaware? If the Senate of the United States has the right to determine in that kind of a case, has it not the right in any other kind of a case if there is a doubt as to what the construction of the constitution of the State of Delaware should be as to the number constituting the Delaware senate? Is the Senate of the United States bound hand and foot by the decision of the State of Delaware, giving a misconstruction to the constitution of that State, admitting an unreasonable number to the membership of the senate of that State, and a number not permitted by the constitution? That will test the argument of the Senator and will also, at the same time, test my argument, and I am willing to have it tested by an answer to that question.

Mr. GRAY. I suppose that if the Senator makes his own argument and applies his own tests he will be very happy, but I have been applying some tests to his argument which seem to make him a little unhappy.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Not at all.

Mr. GRAY. I propose to go on and apply my own tests, because if we pursue his suggestion we would never get through, and we would have to submit at the outset—

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator admitted just what I said. He does not differ at all with the proposition I stated, and that is that his contention is that though the senate of Delaware may only decide in the first instance in regard to a constitutional question involved in the qualifications of one of its own members, and can not decide it finally, the Senate of the United States can. Then his reply was, "Oh, the Senate of the United States is a superior jurisdiction." He did not mean that. I know he did not mean it in the only sense in which it can be taken, because, as I have shown, the word "superior" and the word "inferior" are not admissible in talking about the constitution of a State and the Constitution of the United States. Each is supreme in its own sphere. It admits of no superior, and of course I know the Senator is too good a lawyer to contest that argument.

But let me read it again, because it is well to go back to the sources of constitutional law, and keep ourselves, like the sailors when they take an observation, upon the true course.

The Chief Justice says in McCulloch vs. State of Maryland:

In America—

The United States—

the powers of sovereignty are divided between the Government of the Union and those of the States, and they are each sovereign with respect to the objects committed to it, and neither is sovereign with respect to the objects committed to the other.

Now, there is committed to the senate of Delaware by its constitution the power to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members, and when it does judge that judgment is final. It can not be reviewed by any other authority in the State or out of it. The supreme court of the State would not presume to review it, and yet the Senator from Oregon says that the Senate of the United States can review it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me?

Mr. GRAY. I will come to the Senator's question in just a moment. He has put a case, as he has been doing all through this argument, outside the one we are arguing, and he has supposed that a tenth senator was admitted by the senate of Delaware where the constitution provides for only nine. That question is very easily answered; the answer is obvious to everyone, but I am not going to answer it, because I am not going to be led outside of this case. What they have adjudged in this case is what we are concerned with, and not what they might adjudge in a supposititious case.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that that very question was discussed and fully answered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. GRAY. I recollect it very well.

Mr. BACON. I think it is hardly necessary for the Senator to repeat it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask a question of the Senator from Delaware, and also of the Senator from Georgia? Does the power given to the Delaware senate to judge as to the qualifications, returns, and election of its own members include the power to determine what number shall constitute the senate of Delaware?

Mr. GRAY. The constitution determines that question.

Mr. GEORGE. Nine.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is just—

Mr. GRAY. It is an abuse of language—

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am glad we can agree on one point.

Mr. GRAY. It is an abuse of language to say that there is any necessity of construction, interpretation, or exegesis as to what a word denoting number means. You have somewhere to arrive at an initial point in the exercise of human intelligence. When you arrive at a numeral you must understand what it means; and it does not mean anything else. Nine does not mean ten; nine does not mean eight. That is all there is of it.

The case that we are trying is not whether a tenth member was admitted, but whether, as the Senator from Oregon contends, the number of the senate of Delaware established by the constitution at nine has been reduced to eight, for he distinctly says that it has. He has said so three times in the course of his argument. That is the case we are dealing with, and I do not propose to evade an answer to that question.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Right upon that question the Senator will allow me. I say that in one theory of this case advocated on this side of the Chamber the constitution of the State of Delaware is open to construction as to what number the senate of the State of Delaware is to consist of during the time the speaker of the senate is exercising the office of governor. My argument is that, it being open to construction upon that point, it not being a matter fixed by numerals specific and plain that everybody understands, as we all understand what eight means and what nine means, one of two constructions may be placed upon it. If that is true, if I am correct about it, and assuming for the sake of the argument that I am correct whether I am or not, suppose the senate of the State of Delaware construed it wrong or construed it right—

Mr. GEORGE. In whose judgment?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It being a matter open to construction as to the number that constitutes the senate of the State of Delaware during that particular time, will not the Senator from Delaware agree with me in the view that in that kind of a case the judgment of the senate of Delaware would not be binding upon us?

Mr. GRAY. It is just as impossible for me to agree with the Senator from Oregon as to agree that nine means eight or that eight means nine. Of course I do not agree with him.

The Senator from Oregon has been struggling all through the discussion of this question to get around the plain provision of the constitution of Delaware that the senate shall consist of nine members. But he says while we admit that there is such a clause in the constitution, similar to a clause in every other constitution in the United States, that each house shall judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, here is a case it can not judge of, but the Senate of the United States can. How did he get away from that? Does the proposition appear any the less monstrous since his explanation that the Senate of the United States has had conferred upon them some sort of power to make a final judgment upon the qualifications of a senator of the State of Delaware which the senate of that State has no right to make?

There you come back to it. I say it is monstrous, however you put it. The trained American lawyer rejects it as abhorrent in its statement—

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator will allow me again, because I do not intend to be placed in a false position so far as this question is concerned. Suppose the constitution of the State of Delaware had a clause in it similar to that in the Pennsylvania constitution, to which my friend referred the other day, or a specific clause that the speaker upon succeeding to the exercise of the office of governor should not be a senator, so that there would not be any question about it at all. The Senator would agree with me certainly that in such a case, during the time when the senator who was speaker of the senate exercised the office of governor, there would be a reduction of one in the senate.

Mr. GRAY. Oh, no; the vacancy would be filled.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Suppose it were different? I am supposing a case.

Mr. GRAY. Oh!

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not mean to claim that that is this case. I am supposing a case where, by the express provision of the constitution of the State of Delaware, it is provided in terms that while the speaker of the senate exercises the office of governor the senate, instead of being composed of 9 members, shall be composed of 8 members. Then there would be no question about it. In that event, under a constitution of that kind, I think certainly the Senator from Delaware will agree with me that if the senate of Delaware put in a ninth member, under the pretense of passing upon the qualifications, returns, and election of their own members, the Senate of the United States would not be bound by the judgment.

While I admit that there is no such positive and specific provision in the constitution of the State of Delaware, I claim that a fair construction of the constitution of Delaware means precisely that. Then I say that if it does mean precisely that, in that case the senate of Delaware consists of only eight members for and during the time the speaker of the senate exercises the functions of governor. If I am right in my construction—the Senator of course contends I am not—and the senate of the State of Delaware had admitted a man to that place, I contend that it would be a judgment as to passing upon the admission of a man which would not be binding here. That is my argument.

Mr. GRAY. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Oregon. He has made a great many suppositions. I want to make one. Suppose we try this case upon the facts as they appear in the record, and upon the constitution of Delaware instead of upon the constitution of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is just what I am trying to do.

Mr. GRAY. You can not get more out of a proposition than there is in it. I have stated the proposition of the Senator as in substance and effect made, and however he may indulge in circumlocution, however he may restate it, it all comes back to the same thing, that the senate of Delaware can not finally determine whether it is a fair construction of their own constitution that there are eight members instead of nine, but that the Senate of the United States can. Is it any less objectionable now? Is it not just as abhorrent to reason? Does it not just as much reverse all the notions that have obtained in all the years as to American constitutions and as to the powers of government as when it was stated in its bold form? Has it gained anything of comeliness in the more roundabout fashion of statement adopted just now by the Senator from Oregon? That is the proposition. I have not misunderstood the Senator.

The Senator from Oregon, as the Senator from Mississippi has said, has been indulging all through the argument in supposititious cases. We want to argue this case. When the senate of Delaware adjudged—that is, determined finally—that Mr. Watson, duly elected as a senator from Kent County, with proper credentials, occupying one of the three seats from that county, not a fourth seat, not a tenth seat, was properly a member, his term of senator not having expired, and as such entitled to participate as a senator in all the proceedings of that body, why was not that decision final? If it was not final, it must be because the Senate of the United States has a function and a power conferred upon it to determine finally what the senate of Delaware can not determine finally. That is all there is about it. There we are arrived at the same point again. We have not advanced a single hair's breadth from the original position as I stated it.

Mr. President, the constitutions of our States, as well as the Constitution of the United States, are all postulated upon the intelligence of the citizens of the States. In no part of our scheme of government is there distrust evinced of the people in any State. Why should the senate of Delaware be distrusted to determine finally a question arising as to the election and qualifications of one of its own members, and not the Senate of the United States? Why is it not as competent to determine? Is there anywhere admitted in our scheme of government any inferiority of the States or of the people of the States to the people of the Union at large, or of the representatives of the States in their legislatures to the representatives in the Congress of the United States? They are drawn from the same citizenship; they are drawn from the same communities. There is no inferiority to be thought of with reference to their character or their functions.

Of course, when you come to decide what our great public American policy is, there is an absolute ignoring of every suggestion of distinction as to ability, function, power, or capacity of the representatives in the State legislatures and those in the Congress of the United States. The Union could not have been formed upon any other terms. Therefore we find it and we find it adjudicated over and over and over again that this power is a final one, it is an exclusive one, and that they are empowered just as the Senate of the United States is empowered to judge of the law as well as of the fact.

Mr. President, where do you find, where does the Senator from Oregon find, the authority for the ingenious proposition that he has made on this branch of the subject, that they may judge of the fact and not of the law? What writer on American law or on constitutional law can be adduced to support that monstrous proposition? It may judge of the fact and not of the law! Who tells you this? Who says so? Not the Constitution of the United States; not the constitution of the State of Delaware, for it says simply shall judge—determine finally—every question that is involved in the admission of a senator.

Suppose, according to the real belief of the Senator from Oregon, there was a vacancy or there was claimed to be a vacancy in the representation of Kent County in the senate of Delaware when Mr. Watson assumed the exercise of governor, and there had been a writ of election issued by somebody in order to fill that seat, and the man elected to fill the seat had presented his credentials. Was not the senate of Delaware competent to decide whether he should be admitted or whether Mr. Watson still occupied that seat, and to decide that did they not have to decide whether there was a vacancy or not? Had they not jurisdiction of the whole subject-matter? I should like to hear the Senator from Oregon answer that question when he comes to talk about this case again.

Of course they did. If that question had been decided either by putting the man elected in or by turning him away from its doors and saying Mr. Watson still holds his seat by virtue of his election two years ago for the term of four years, are we not bound by it? Is not that the very matter which is submitted by the constitution to the senate of Delaware to decide—a question of fact and law I admit. We have no division in the judgment of the senate as we have between court and jury, the question of fact being for the jury and the question of law being for the court. But they are the judges necessarily of the law and fact, or they can not be judges at all, and it is absurd to call them judges.

Mr. President, let us see if we have any authority for so plain a proposition as this. The Senator from Oregon cited a case from Kansas, in 11 Kansas, in which Judge Brewer decided that when the constitution says the house of representatives of the legislature of Kansas shall consist of, say, 125 members, and where four or five additions to that number were admitted from districts that had not been created by law—and in that case an election I think was had (I will ask my friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] if he recollects it)—a State printer who claimed to be elected by the legislature was not elected, because there had been certain members admitted to seats which did not exist. That is all there is about that. The case is in 11 Kansas. Judge Brewer says:

Article II, section 8, declares that each house "shall be judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Its determination is not—the subject of appeal or review. It is final—

In this very case—

And I hope the Senator, although he has read it over and over again, will listen to me as I emphasize it—
It is final, and concludes everyone.

The Senator says it concludes everyone except himself and his brother Senators in the United States Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Except the friends of Mr. Du Pont.
Mr. GRAY. Now, what is included in this power?

Does the power to judge of the qualifications of its members include the power to increase such membership?

Of course it does not—

Can it enlarge its members without limit? Is it like an academy of science or a lodge of Odd Fellows, capable of indefinite expansion? * * * And if one house can admit members above the limit prescribed by law, why may it not above the constitutional limit? But when—

And here is what I ask the attention of the Senator to from this very case, which is relied upon so much by the Senator from Oregon—

But when the district exists, then the decision of the house as to who shall represent that district is conclusive and final.

Now, what does "conclusive and final" mean? Conclusive and final on everybody except this privileged body, privileged beyond everything that was ever conceived of in American law—the Senate of the United States?

Mr. GEORGE. Final and conclusive upon everybody except the friends of Mr. Du Pont.

Mr. GRAY. Except the Senate of the United States, I will say. It determines who was elected; whether the returns are sufficient, and also whether the party elected has the proper qualifications. Over all these matters its jurisdiction is ample, its determination final.

Mr. President, it has sometimes been said that words are used to conceal thought, but no one ever believed that words, as they are used in constitutions or in the decisions of our courts, were meant for anything but to express their plain and obvious meaning, and "final and conclusive" has but one plain and obvious meaning, and that is that it is final as to everybody; it is conclusive upon all.

Now, Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, says the same thing:

There are certain matters which each house determines for itself, and in respect to which its decision is—conclusive.

What?

And among these things is the right to membership in either house.

So much for the Kansas case cited by the Senator from Oregon. Let us take the other Kansas case, already referred to by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and see if we can not extract from it some construction and gain some light upon this question, which I admit does not need elucidation, but which the Senator from Oregon has been able, I will admit, to befog to some extent. It takes a very able man to befog so plain a proposition.

The same judge, Brewer, now an associate justice of the Supreme Court, in the case of Kansas ex rel. Attorney-General vs. Gilmore, says:

The constitution declares, Article II, section 8, that each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. This is a grant of power, and constitutes each house the ultimate tribunal—

Not to decide in the first instance, as the Senator from Oregon says, but the ultimate tribunal. Of course the Senator agrees with me that if it is the ultimate tribunal, even the Senate of the United States could not review that decision.

The two houses acting conjointly do not decide. Each house acts for itself and by itself; and from its decision there is no appeal, not even to the two houses. And this power is not exhausted when once it has been exercised, and a member admitted to his seat.

Now, we are coming right down to this case. Mr. Watson was undeniably admitted to his seat.

It is a continuous power and runs through the entire term. At any time and at all times during the term of office, each house is empowered to pass upon the present qualifications of its own members. By section 5 of the same article acceptance of a Federal office vacates a member's seat.

I have the constitution of Kansas here and have referred to it. It provides that the acceptance of a Federal office ipso facto vacates a member's seat.

Mr. TURPIE. In the legislature.

Mr. GRAY. As a member of the legislature.

He ceases to be qualified—

Says Judge Brewer—

and of this house is the judge. If it ousts a member on the claim that he has accepted a Federal office, no court or other tribunal can reinstate him. If it refuses to oust a member, his seat is beyond judicial challenge.

Of course the Senator from Oregon is at liberty to differ with Judge Brewer. The Senator from Oregon is an authority of himself, I admit, and I would defer in almost any case that I had not examined or as to which I had not established a conviction to his opinion as a lawyer. But I cite here the opinion of a judge delivered in a case properly presented and argued before him, in which there were no prepossessions or preconceived opinions to defend, as we must assume, in the exercise of that high judicial function. I am afraid that we all on both sides have some preconceived opinions in this case, and therefore I do cite this judicial opinion of Judge Brewer as one that is decisive as to the power of the Senate to review the action of the senate of Delaware in regard to the qualification and right of Mr. Watson to sit as a member of that body.

What are you going to do with that decision? What are you going to do with this doctrine, admitted everywhere, and contrary to which not a single expression of any jurist or law writer has been produced? We can trample it under foot. We have got the power to do this thing. But I assert that we will never do a thing because we have the power unless we can do it rightfully, and that is the safety of our institutions and the assurance and guaranty to the people of the United States that their constitutional government will be preserved.

Mr. President, that is not all. There is another case cited already. That same distinguished jurist from whose text-book I read, Judge Cooley, in 13 Michigan, already cited by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] and the Senator from Mississippi

[Mr. GEORGE], gave us a deliverance on this very point. Thirtieth Michigan, 481, is the case, and I read from page 492. Judge Cooley said, in reply to an argument made by counsel, that the house or senate—I do not recollect which it was—had the right to judge of the facts, but not of the law:

It is a sufficient answer to this argument that, while the constitution has conferred the general judicial power of the State upon the courts and officers specified, there are certain powers of a judicial nature which, by the same instrument, are expressly conferred upon other bodies or officers; and among them is the power to judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of members of the legislature. The terms employed clearly show that each house, in deciding, acts in a judicial capacity, and there is no clause in the constitution which empowers this or any other court to review their action. The "general superintending control" which the supreme court possesses, under section 3 of Article VI of the constitution, "over all inferior courts," does not extend to the judicial action of the legislative houses in the cases where it has been deemed necessary to confer judicial powers upon them with a view to enable them to perfect their organization and perform their legislative duties. The houses are not "inferior courts" in the sense of the constitution, but, as legislative organizations, are vested with certain powers of final decision, for reasons which are clearly imperative.

It may happen, as suggested in the argument, that with each House not only deciding for itself questions of fact, but also construing for itself the law, we may sometimes witness the extraordinary spectacle of the two bodies construing and enforcing the law differently, while a third construction is enforced by the courts upon the public at large. But with this possibility in view, the evils of allowing the courts a supervisory power over the decisions of the houses upon the admission of members are so great and so obvious that it is not surprising that the framers of the constitution refrained from conferring the power. The supervision could not ordinarily be exercised during the session of the legislative body, and to correct the decisions afterwards by annulling the laws passed would only be to substitute a great public evil for that which might have been a wrong to an individual member and to the district which elected him, but which could seldom affect the State at large.

It can make no difference that in this case, according to the pleas, the question passed upon by the house was purely a question of law. The question of the legal election of a member is usually a question compounded of law and fact and the house must necessarily pass upon both. If we have the power to review the decision in one case, we have in all. If we can correct their erroneous construction of a law, we have the same power to correct any erroneous decision upon returns, qualifications, or majorities. It is sufficient for us to say that the constitution has not conferred upon us this jurisdiction, and whether the decision made is right or wrong, we shall leave it where it has been left by the fundamental law of the State.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Let me ask the Senator from Delaware a question at that point. I do not know that there is anything in it, but it strikes me that there is probably, after all. Does the Senator think that the cases are exactly parallel, so far as applying a rule is concerned, in attempting to attack a decision of a legislative body collaterally that way before a court and a proceeding like the one in which we are now engaged, the election of a Senator? Is it not possible that there is a difference?

Mr. GRAY. I do not think, so far as this case is concerned, that it is possible that there is any difference which prevents that exposition of doctrine from being applied literally and exactly to the case in hand. If there was anything in the matter that it was collaterally before the court Judge Cooley did not say so, and if it were collaterally before the court it is collaterally before this court. The State of Delaware is not a party.

Mr. TURPIE. Nor is Watson a party.

Mr. GRAY. Nor is Watson a party. I take it as in the case in 11 Kansas, where it was the case of the election of State printer. The State printer was pursuing his rights in court, and the doctrine laid down by Judge Brewer in that case entirely coincides with what he laid down in the subsequent case in 20 Kansas. It is possible the Senator might reply that the courts of the States will not undertake to review this jurisdiction thus conferred by a State constitution, yet the Senate of the United States does not come within this all-embracing finality which has been ascribed by these eminent judges to the decision of the House upon the question of the qualifications of its members. Then I will not stop to show why there is no difference and why when a thing is final or conclusive on everybody it necessarily includes the Senate of the United States. I will simply refer to the fact that the Senate of the United States has determined for itself that it is bound by this very doctrine and has several times enunciated it when it had jurisdiction of the question. In Sykes vs. Spencer, in Taft's cases, at page 521, the committee say and the Senate adopted the report:

In the opinion of your committee it is not competent for the Senate to inquire as to the right of individual members to sit in a legislature which is conceded to have a quorum in both houses of legally elected members.

The only thing that the Senate of the United States has ever permitted itself to do is in a case where there are two bodies each claiming to be the legislature of the State to decide which is the lawful legislature. That it has to do, of course.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That was the Sykes case.

Mr. GRAY. I know, but when of the two contesting bodies which is the lawful legislature has been determined, then the doctrine applies which they lay down in the Sykes case that—

In the opinion of your committee it is not competent for the Senate to inquire as to the right of individual members to sit in a legislature which is conceded to have a quorum in both houses of legally elected members.

Mr. TURPIE. That is the Delaware case.

Mr. GRAY. That is the Delaware case. The Turpie case, page

625 of the same volume, was interesting and instructive. The committee say, and the report was adopted by the Senate:

We also think that the judgment of the senate of Indiana as to the title of Messrs. Branahan and McDonald, the two members in question, to their seats is binding upon the Senate of the United States. This body is made by the constitution the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members. The senate of Indiana is likewise the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members. We must determine all questions arising out of the proceedings of the electors. But who sustain the character of electors is to be determined by the legislative body of the State.

The character of electors in the election held for a United States Senator in Delaware May 9, 1895, must be determined by each house of that legislature, and that is what the Senate says in the Turpie case, and it said it was so determined and we are bound by that determination.

We can not inquire into the motives which control its judgment. In rendering that judgment, whether it shall give a hearing to parties, permit debate, examine witnesses, act upon evidence or without evidence, are matters within its own discretion. If that discretion were exercised in the manner charged by the remonstrance, a majority think that a public crime was committed, for which the offenders are responsible to the people of Indiana. But we can not try the question. (Case of David Turpie, page 625.)

Now, they thought a great public crime had been committed in Indiana upon the statements made by the claimants, and yet, notwithstanding that, they said that the Senate of the United States was concluded by that determination, though they believed it to be not only wrong but a crime, and that it could not be reinvestigated and redetermined in the Senate of the United States. In Clark and McGinnis vs. Landers and Power, in the same volume, at page 637, we find the same doctrine declared:

Every act of the assembly in which they take part, and to which their consent is necessary, has an absolute validity as if their title had been affirmed by an adjudication of the house itself.

The committee in this report, submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], were speaking of certain members that it was claimed had been unlawfully admitted to participation in the powers of the house of representatives.

Their title is not, as is sometimes carelessly said, a prima facie title. It is an absolute title, continuing until the house itself has adjudicated that some other person be admitted to their place. This adjudication is only operative for the future, and has no retroactive effect whatever. When the house makes the inquiry on the merits, it may treat the credentials as prima facie evidence upon that question. But until the house tries the case the credential is conclusive.

What? On the house alone? No—to all the world.

Further on, in the same report, the committee say:

The report in Sykes vs. Spencer, decided by the Senate in 1873, is relied upon as supporting an opinion contrary to that which we have stated. If so, we dissent from it. But it is to be remarked that in that case, which was upon an election held less than seven years after the close of the war, the doctrine of the report is not relied upon in the debate. * * * We think there are but two ways in which it can be proved to the Senate. One is the possession of lawful credentials. The other is the judgment of the House itself, not only the final, but the sole judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members.

Mr. GEORGE. Final and sole.

Mr. GRAY. Now, I am going to read again an authority that has already been read and commented upon, because it seems it is very hard to make an impression upon the obdurate and unbelieving minds of the unconverted. Cushing, in his work on the Laws and Practice of the Legislative Assemblies, says, on page 195:

SECTION VII.—DISQUALIFICATION.

Whenever a member ceases to possess those qualifications, which are in their nature continuing, or which members are expressly required to possess during their continuance in office—as, for example, when a member removes from the State or other local constituency in which he is required to continue to reside whilst in office—the seat of such member is thereby liable to be adjudged vacant upon the fact of such disqualification being brought to the knowledge of the assembly. To the disqualifications of this kind may be added those which result from the commission of some crime which would render the member ineligible, or from some gross official or other misconduct, in consequence of which he is expelled or discharged from being a member. In all these cases, unless there is some express provision of law by which the subject is regulated, the fact of disqualification can only be inquired into and decided upon by the assembly itself.

SECTION VIII.—ACCEPTANCE OF DISQUALIFYING OR INCOMPATIBLE OFFICES.

The distinction has already been explained between those offices or employments the possession of which at the time of the election renders a person ineligible, and those the functions of which are merely incompatible with the functions of a member; the former avoiding the election, the latter only preventing the person elected from exercising the functions of a member until they are removed. When, however, a member has once been duly elected and taken his seat, this distinction no longer exists, the acceptance of disqualifying and incompatible offices being equally effectual to create a vacancy.

The only practical question in cases of this kind usually relates to the time when the acceptance of an office takes place. The subject is sometimes regulated by law, but where this is not the case it may be considered, as a rule, founded in the reason of the thing and corresponding with the practice, so far as it is known, of all our legislative assemblies, that, in order to vacate the seat of a member by the acceptance of a disqualifying or incompatible office, the election or appointment thereto alone is not sufficient, but the member must either have signified his acceptance of the office in a formal manner, or have done what is incumbent on him to qualify himself to discharge its duties, or have actually entered upon their discharge. In cases of this kind the existence of the vacancy must be declared by the assembly itself. In cases arising under this and the preceding section there is, in fact, no vacancy until it is so declared or implied by the resolution of the assembly itself.

Now, Mr. President, that brings me down to this ipso facto argument, which I will not treat separately, but as I am fatigued and the Senate is fatigued, will only notice in passing to my conclusion. In a case in Kansas where the constitution provided that the acceptance of a certain office vacated the legislative office ipso facto Judge Brewer said that there was no vacancy unless the senate or the house, as the case might be, passed a judgment of ouster, and until that judgment was passed he was to all intents and purposes a de facto member and that his participation in the acts of the legislature could not be inquired into. So Cushing, as to the very case argued by the Senator from Oregon, that a disqualifying office has vacated the legislative office, says emphatically, without qualification:

There is no vacancy until it is so declared or implied by the resolution of the assembly itself.

Mr. President, I will leave that ipso facto branch of the argument right there.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware a question right on that point.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. VILAS. Has there ever been known a case, is there any shown in the books, where the action of a legislative body was challenged by reason of the participation in it of any member of that body whom the body itself admitted?

Mr. GRAY. In answer to the question of the Senator from Wisconsin, I will state that I have not found anywhere such a case. I have asked my distinguished and honorable friends the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Indiana if they ever discovered in their researches such a case. They have replied that they have not. I have heard no such case adduced by those who have argued the other side of this question. If one such case can be cited, I should be glad to have it produced now or during the pending debate, and I challenge its production. Of course I am not omniscient and do not know that there is no such case, but I do not believe that such a case can be found, for it is not in the reason of the thing that there should be such a case. The acts of a de facto officer are as valid as those of one de jure. This well-settled doctrine of law is one that also applies with determinative force to this case.

Now, Mr. President, I go a little further on the matter of how a vacancy is worked where there is an alleged disqualification. The constitution of Delaware has prescribed certain disqualifications for members of the house and senate, as well as qualifications. Of course qualifications and disqualifications are the same thing so far as the jurisdiction of the house is concerned, for qualification is nothing but the absence of disqualification. There are certain qualifications asserted and there are certain disqualifications asserted for a senator with which we are concerned.

Section 3, Article II, provides that—

No person shall be a senator who shall not have attained to the age of 27 years and have in the county in which he shall be chosen a freehold estate in 20 acres of land, or an estate in real and personal property, or in either, of the value of $1,000 at least, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the State three years next preceding the first meeting of the legislature after his election, and the last year of that term an inhabitant of the county in which he shall be chosen, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States or of this State.

Those are qualifications. Now as to disqualifications:

No person concerned in any army or navy contract, nor member of Congress, nor any person holding any office under this State or the United States, except the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice, respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia, holding no disqualifying office, shall, during his continuance in Congress or in office, be a senator or representative.

Unquestionably under the power conferred by section 6 of that article, "Each house shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," if it is alleged either that a man is not 27 years old, or that he has an army or navy contract, or that he is a member of Congress, or that he holds an office under that State, the senate must judge of that disqualification. The Senator from Oregon admits that it must judge of it, and that the mere existence of the disqualifying fact does not operate to unseat him or invalidate any act in which he participates unless there has been a judgment of ouster by the body to which he claims to belong. That proposition is universal. There is no case cited to the contrary; there is no authority that controverts it anywhere.

The very section on which the Senator from Oregon relies, that holding an office under the State disqualifies him to be a senator while exercising the office of governor, says that if he is concerned in an army or navy contract it disqualifies him. They are coupled in the same clause. Suppose there was present and voting upon the day on which Mr. Du Pont claims to have been elected a senator who was interested in a navy contract or affected by some of the other disqualifications enumerated in the constitution, and enumerated in the very clause on which the Senator from Oregon relies, that his vote in the joint assembly, as well as in the senate, had been acquiesced in without protest or objection, much less without a judgment of ouster by the senate, is it claimed that the Senate of the United States can adjudicate his right and practically pronounce a judgment of ouster? No; the Senator from Oregon does not say so. He does not say so. The other side have to make a case where the senate of Delaware can not judge of the qualifications of its own members; and there is no such case.

Mr. TURPIE. There can not be such a case.

Mr. GRAY. There can not be such a case. Take any of the State constitutions, which are very much alike in prescribing these disqualifications. The constitution of New Hampshire for nearly a hundred years, from 1784 to 1877, in prescribing the qualifications of the members of the house of representatives, said, just as the constitution of Delaware says:

Every member of the house of representatives shall be chosen by ballot; and for two years at least next preceding his election shall have been an inhabitant of this State, shall have an estate within the town, parish, or place which he may be chosen to represent of the value of £100, one-half of which to be a freehold, whereof he is seized in his own right; shall be at the time of his election an inhabitant of the town, parish, or place he may be chosen to represent; shall be of the Protestant religion, and shall cease to represent such town, parish, or place immediately on his ceasing to be qualified as aforesaid.

I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], if he were present, how that worked, if any of those disqualifications worked ipso facto. If, for instance, a law was passed and there was necessary for its passage the vote of some man who had been elected and was not a Protestant, who was either a Roman Catholic or an agnostic, would that act be invalid without a judgment of ouster? How are you going to find out whether a man is a Protestant or a Catholic, or how did they find out in New Hampshire prior to 1877 whether a member of the house was a Protestant or a Catholic? Was it competent for any man walking on the street to charge that So and So is a Catholic and therefore not competent to sit in the legislature of New Hampshire? I take it not, so far as any effect from that assertion would go.

Mr. TURPIE. Or to assert it here.

Mr. GRAY. Or to assert it here in the Senate of the United States, when the credentials of a Senator elected by the legislature of New Hampshire come before us. The Senator from Oregon, if he made the same argument in a case of that kind that he makes in this, would say here is a seat not open to occupation, for it says that he shall immediately cease to represent the town upon his ceasing to be qualified as aforesaid. So it will be charged here, proved, and admitted on the record that A B, a member of the house, who participated in the election for United States Senator, had conformed to the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church, and therefore it appears upon the record that a disqualification inhered in him as to that office.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I will admit in this case, if the fact was disputed that the speaker of the senate had succeeded to the exercise of the office of governor and was exercising the office of governor, then, as a matter of course, it would be for the Delaware State senate to pass upon it. Here all the facts are admitted by everybody.

Mr. GRAY. Very well; I am supposing just now that case.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Who will decide whether the man shall sit in the senate or not?

Mr. GRAY. I understand it. I am supposing just that case, that in 1876 a man had come here claiming to be elected a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, and that upon the journal of the senate of that legislature it was found that one of the persons who voted for him, and whose vote was necessary to his election, was admitted to be of the Roman Catholic religion.

Mr. ALLEN. And still the legislature had allowed him to sit there.

Mr. GRAY. And still the legislature had allowed him to sit there; had not chosen to oust him for his religious opinions. I want to know whether the Senate of the United States would claim to exercise the jurisdiction to cast that man from its doors and say, "Go hence; you are not worthy to be a Senator of the United States, because you were voted for by a man who was admitted to have been a Roman Catholic in the legislature of New Hampshire."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will answer that in that case, if it were the law to-day, as it is not fortunately—

Mr. GRAY. No, I said in 1876.

Mr. GEORGE. In 1877.

Mr. GRAY. It was changed in 1877.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If that were the law to-day, and the senate itself had spread on its record the fact of the disability, and the provision of the constitution was plain and specific that on the existence of that fact the person has no right to sit there, then I would say we were not bound by it.

Mr. GRAY. Then you claim an appellate jurisdiction in the Senate of the United States from the legislature of New Hampshire?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do in that case under those circumstances, where the senate of the State had passed upon the question of fact and made it a matter of senatorial record.

Mr. GRAY. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Because in that case it would be in adjudication by the New Hampshire senate itself of the very fact of disability which the constitution imposes.

Mr. GRAY. I am not surprised that the Senator from Oregon has so declared. He was driven to declare so by the logic of his position, and he is too good a logician to blink at a conclusion after he has staked himself upon the premises. Of course, it brought him just to that point, and he was bound to admit that absurd conclusion; but that absurd conclusion is not supported by any text-writer or any jurist or any man who is competent to discuss American public law that I know of; certainly no such support has been cited in my presence in the Senate.

Mr. President, this whole doctrine of an ipso facto working of a vacancy upon the acceptance of an incompatible office, admitting that there was an incompatibility, does not apply to the case of a member of the legislature. In all the cases cited those offices are other than legislative offices; they are all cases where the function of the office which is vacated is one possessed by the person in its entirety; it is a function by itself, not participated in by others, upon which he does not have to depend on the judgment of others; but when you come to this quasi office of member of the legislature, where you are a unit of the greater body where the function is performed, the legislature of which you are only one constituent unit, then you must depend for your position and status in that body, not only by reason of the constitutional provision, but necessarily upon the judgment of the body itself. In other words, if we admit for the sake of the argument that the exercise of the office of governor is either an incompatible or prohibited office, it can not work of itself a vacation of the legislative office. This doctrine only applies to offices which are such in the proper sense of the term, when the holder of it has a function complete in itself, and whose status is independent of others in like situation. In the case of a member of a legislative body such member is only a part of an organized body—the legislative duty or function is in the organization, not in the member—such body has a self-recognizing capacity and individuality, and controls its own organization and the relations of its constituent parts or members. It can not be changed against its judgment.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator carry that doctrine so far as to say that the legislative body's own judgment as to whether a quorum is present is binding upon us?

Mr. GRAY. That has nothing to do with this case. I admit it is a question that might occupy my consideration if I were not arguing something else; but the Senator will excuse me from going into it now. I frankly say that I am not prepared to answer it.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that it has a close relation to this case.

Mr. GRAY. Whether it has a close relation or not, I am really not prepared to answer it, I say frankly. I am considering now the powers of the house to judge as to its own organization and as to the units that make up that organization.

I have said about all that I think it is necessary for me to say on this subject. No doubt I have, in the opinion of the Senate, said much more than was necessary for me to say, but the question is interesting. It involves very much the integrity of our constitutional system in the State of Delaware, and it involves very much the integrity and continuity of the judgments of this body in similar cases—how far it will permit this Senate to judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of members in the legislature of a State. We can judge of the procedure that has taken place in the election of a United States Senator, what the electors prescribed by the constitution have done; but who are the electors, in the language of the Senate in Turple's case, is a matter which must be determined by the legislature itself.

Mr. President, it will not evade this universal, this accepted doctrine of American constitutional law to say that in this case there was a seat in the Delaware senate not subject to occupancy. That is only another way of stating the same fact. Whether there was a seat subject to occupancy then, whether there was a seat filled or no, whether there was a vacancy in a recognized seat provided for by the constitution is a question for the senate of Delaware to determine. Judge Brewer says, in the very case cited by the Senator from Oregon, was there a district provided for by law; and if there was a district, then who should occupy it was a matter for the house itself to determine. So in this case, we say there was a district provided not by law, but by the constitution itself, the organic law, the highest law of the State; and whether Mr. Watson filled it, or whether it should be declared a vacancy and another person be elected from Kent County to fill it, was a thing for the senate of Delaware to determine, and when it did determine it it determined it finally. That view of the matter concludes this question—it might all have been said in comparatively a few words. What is the jurisdiction of the United States Senate over this subject-matter? If we have not that jurisdiction, and the senate of Delaware had, that is all there is of it, and we need not multiply words in arguing it.

Mr. Du Pont was declared by the joint assembly not elected, because he did not receive a majority of the votes of the lawfully elected members of the legislature who participated in that election on the 9th day of May, 1895; and to reverse that declaration by a judgment of the Senate of the United States would be to do violence to the constitution and laws of Delaware and deprive that State of a right which belongs exclusively to the State and its legislature under the Constitution of the United States.

I thank the Senate for the patience with which they have listened to me.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3281) to authorize reassessments for improvements and general taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3606) granting a pension to French W. Thornhill; A bill (H. R. 5258) granting an honorable discharge to John B. Besler; and

A bill (H. R. 5853) granting a pension to Arminda Stucker, of Gallatin, Mo.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The Senator from Kansas will please suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. PEPPER. In pursuance of the unanimous consent of the Senate given yesterday, I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 332, being the bond-sale resolution.

Mr. VILAS. I do not understand that there was any unanimous agreement that the unfinished business should be laid aside.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not know that there was—

Mr. VILAS. If the request of the Senator from Kansas is agreed to, it substitutes the bond resolution for the unfinished business.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not care what the proceeding is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I am calling attention to the fact that I object not to the unfinished business being displaced, but if there is an order which is entitled to the right of way—and I do not know but that there is—it is an order which displaces the unfinished business.

Mr. PEPPER. Unanimous consent of the Senate was given that at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware the Senate should proceed to the consideration of the order of business which I have just suggested.

Mr. VILAS. I do not object to the Senate proceeding to the consideration of that order of business, if that was the agreement. I only object to its being done while the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. That was not part of the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the last order of the Senate on the subject.

Mr. VILAS. On what page of the RECORD?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On pages 3961, 3962 of the RECORD of April 15.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. PEPPER. I understand the agreement to be just as it was made, Mr. President. There was a unanimous-consent agreement made a few days ago that yesterday at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. we should proceed to the consideration of the bond resolution, but yesterday at 2.15 o'clock we were not ready by reason of the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. CHANDLER) was on the floor in the midst of a speech. Then, by unanimous consent, the agreement was postponed or delayed until to-day at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Delaware (Mr. GRAY).

Mr. ALLISON. Then I understand the unanimous-consent agreement embraces the idea that the bond resolution is to be the unfinished business. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PEPPER. At that time?

Mr. ALLISON. At that time.

Mr. PEPPER. That is the understanding.

Mr. ALLISON. Giving way, of course, either by unanimous consent or otherwise, to appropriation bills.

Mr. PEPPER. That is rubable, undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate in regard to the matter?

Mr. PEPPER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bond resolution in pursuance of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask if that was made the order of business by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been the understanding of the Chair. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Wisconsin to insist on his objection?

Mr. VILAS. I am making no objection to the execution of the unanimous consent that was given. I only insist that the execution of that order displaces the unfinished business which had previously been laid before the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether he will not be willing to allow that special order to be temporarily laid aside until the Indian appropriation bill can be finished?

Mr. PEPPER. No, Mr. President, I am not willing now to do anything but to dispose of the bond resolution in some orderly way. We want to know whether we are going to proceed with it or not.

Mr. CULLOM. I want the Senator to understand that I am not seeking to put his resolution out of the way, so that the Senate will not have a chance to consider it. I may desire to say something on the subject myself before it is disposed of; but I do think, if this Congress is going to adjourn this summer, we must proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. PEPPER. I appreciate the force of the Senator's remarks. This does not happen, however, to be a short session. We have all summer before us, and our salaries are paid by the year. It is true this is a Presidential campaign year, but we certainly shall be able to dispose of all the business before the Senate in a reasonable time and get to this bond resolution, which I regard as a very important one. I have three times procured, through the courtesy of the Senate, unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the resolution; and I do insist now that that consent be enforced by the Senate. Of course I know the Chair can not do it; but I ask the Senate to do it.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that that resolution displaces the unfinished business. The unfinished business is before the Senate. If, while the unfinished business is pending, there is unanimous consent given to take up something else, I do not think the unfinished business is thereby displaced.

Mr. HALE. Or if a motion is made to proceed to any other subject-matter.

Mr. PLATT. If a motion is made and agreed to to proceed to the consideration of another subject, that would displace the unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. Of course; but the Senate can do that at any time it pleases.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; but I do not think unanimous consent to take up something else while the unfinished business is pending would displace the unfinished business until that was disposed of.

Mr. PEPPER. My own view of the case was that it was not the intention of the Senate that the unfinished business should be taken from its place upon the Calendar, but that it should remain there, notwithstanding the enforcement among ourselves of the consent agreement to take up the bond resolution; and that was stated at the time publicly and privately.

Mr. PLATT. We have passed fifty bills by unanimous consent while the unfinished business was pending, and it was never supposed that the unfinished business was thereby displaced.

Mr. HALE. When unanimous consent is given that at a certain time on a certain day a subject-matter shall be taken up or shall be made the unfinished business, unless with that consent there goes a proposition that it shall be continued until disposed of, the record is always one way, that the privilege exhausts itself when the measure is laid before the Senate, and that at any time, either by unanimous consent or on motion, that may be displaced and something else taken up. For one, as to any appropriation bill that I have in charge, I am willing to state that, believing it to be the desire of the Senate to pass the appropriation bills and adjourn at as early a day as possible, no matter what subject-matter has been fixed for a certain time to be taken up, I shall test the sense of the Senate as to whether it will continue to take up days and days, as they have been taken up by the Delaware case, rather than proceed with the consideration of the business of the Senate that everybody wants done. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] gets his unanimous consent enforced when he gets his resolution before the Senate; but immediately the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], if he chooses, can move to take up the Indian appropriation bill, and the Senate may decide, in its discretion, that it is more important to proceed with that bill than with anything else. That is for the Senate to decide.

I protest against the theory that, because unanimous consent is given to take up a particular matter at a particular time, we have to take all the time which the advocates of that measure choose, without having the opportunity of testing the sense of the Senate about taking up anything else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senate the state of the case as he understands it. Unanimous consent seems to have been given to take up the bond-sale resolution upon the conclusion of the argument of the Senator from Delaware. Acting under what he supposed to be the rule, the Chair laid before the Senate the unfinished business soon after 2 o'clock. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] then asked unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside in order to proceed to the consideration of the bond resolution, without displacing the unfinished business, or, to be more correct, only temporarily displacing it. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], as the Chair understands, objects to that conditional laying aside of the unfinished business.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit, when unanimous consent has been given to take up a measure at a fixed time, as in this case, it then becomes the duty of the Chair to lay the matter before the Senate. The Senate can proceed with it, or postpone it, or take up any other matter it sees proper; but unanimous consent having been given to take up any business, it ought to be laid before the Senate. That has been the universal rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. In pursuance of the unanimous-consent agreement, I ask that the bond resolution may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the Chair stated correctly—

Mr. HOAR. What is before the Senate now, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that soon after 2 o'clock, acting upon what he understood to be the rule and also upon the suggestion of the clerks at the desk, he laid before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. What is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution in regard to the Uncompahgre Reservation. Now, the Senator from Kansas asks that that be temporarily laid aside, without losing its place, to take up the bond-sale resolution, for the consideration of which at this time he claims that unanimous consent was heretofore given.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a question of order. Under that consent agreement it is not necessary for the Senator from Kansas to ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. It is already temporarily laid aside by the unanimous-consent agreement, and it is the duty of the Chair to lay the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. VILAS. So far from that being the case, I believe it to be true that the Senate has agreed to take up the bond resolution; but instead of it being a consent that the unfinished business should be laid aside for the purpose, it was expressly the other way, that this resolution should become the unfinished business. The Chair has already had read from the desk the remarks on that subject yesterday, which I shall again read.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] stating the case, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said:

Then I understand the unanimous-consent agreement embraces the idea that the bond resolution is to be the unfinished business. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PEPPER. At that time?

Mr. ALLISON. At that time.

Mr. PEPPER. That is the understanding.

That is what I am now insisting upon. If there had been made a request that it should lay aside the unfinished business instead of becoming the unfinished business itself, that might then have been objected to. It was not a request that the unfinished business should be temporarily laid aside, but it was a request that one order of business should supersede another. That is the effect of the order which was made.

Mr. PEPPER. Then, Mr. President, if it is a mere technical objection, I beg leave to modify the request. My request of the Chair was to lay before the Senate the bond resolution, and the Chair, before recognizing my address, laid before the Senate the unfinished business, the Uncompahgre joint resolution. It was then that I made my request that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that this agreement might go into effect.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under all the circumstances, the Chair is satisfied that perhaps it would have been better, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to have laid the bond resolution before the Senate, and let the Senate dispose of it as it saw fit. The Chair, therefore, now lays that resolution before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. That is right.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I rose for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. PEPPER. I wish to state to the Senate that so far as I know, the friends of this resolution do not intend or expect to spend any more time than has been already expended, or at least very little more time, in the discussion of the resolution. In order that the way may be clear, I will state to the Senate further that when the resolution was first before the Senate the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance. That motion was pending when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived and the resolution went to the Calendar. The next day a somewhat similar resolution was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], with this difference, that instead of making the committee a select committee the resolution provided that the investigation should be prosecuted by the Committee on Finance. I then moved to substitute my resolution of the preceding day for that of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Massachusetts moved to lay my substitute on the table. A vote was taken, which resulted in a majority of 34 to 10 against the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to lay my amendment on the table. In view of that fact, the Senate having once expressed itself by way of preference for a select committee rather than the Committee on Finance, I move to lay the pending motion to refer on the table.

Mr. HOAR. That carries the whole thing with it.

Mr. PEPPER. Oh, no; not under our rules.

Mr. HOAR. I think so.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not so understand.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that under our rules a Senator may move to lay an amendment on the table without carrying the whole subject with it, but this proposition is to lay on the table a motion to refer.

Mr. PEPPER. I understand the rule is the reverse of that.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps it is. I do not know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule is clear as to amendments, but the Chair does not think that there is any express rule of the Senate on this particular subject.

Mr. HOAR. The universal parliamentary rule has been that where any pending motion—

Mr. PEPPER. In order to avoid any further discussion on the subject, I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HILL. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

Mr. VILAS. Before the Secretary reads the resolution, do I understand that the Senate now proceeds to the consideration of the bond resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has laid the resolution before the Senate, and the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] requested that it be read.

Mr. VILAS. I only desire to be specific that I object to this being done except, in pursuance of the understanding, as a substitute for the unfinished business.

Mr. HILL. Except as the unfinished business?

Mr. VILAS. It becomes the unfinished business.

Mr. HILL. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin objects to the consideration of the resolution except as the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. VILAS. I desire it to be understood that the resolution is before the Senate as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is impossible for the Chair to enforce a unanimous-consent agreement, of course; but if it is objected to the question must be determined by the Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. What is the objection, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] objects to the consideration of the bond resolution except as the unfinished business.

Mr. VILAS. Yes; which is in accordance with the consent agreement.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that that question will come up later on. The bond resolution is before the Senate in consequence of the unanimous-consent agreement. Necessarily it displaces everything else. It is now before the Senate, and must remain as the unfinished business until the Senate orders otherwise. So the question raised by the Senator from Wisconsin will come up hereafter; not now.

I ask that the resolution may be read.

Mr. VILAS. That is exactly in accordance with my understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEPPER February 13, 1896, as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators shall be appointed by the Vice-President, whose duty it shall be—

First. To investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Second. To investigate and report specially what amount of available funds, classified, was in the United States Treasury and on deposit in other places subject to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury at the time the bonds were sold or offered for sale; whether there was or was not coin enough on hand to meet all coin obligations of the Government due at the time said bonds were sold or when they were offered for sale; what obligations were due at that time and the amount of each, stated separately; what was the reason for any unusual withdrawal of coin from the Treasury shortly before bonds were sold or offered for sale, if such unusual withdrawals were in fact made, and by what persons or classes of persons and for what purpose or on what account such withdrawals were made; who purchased the bonds, in what amounts, and where, whether in the United States or in foreign countries, and in what proportions, and from what persons or classes of persons the gold was procured with which to pay for the bonds, what the bonds sold for, and what was the market price of our Government bonds at the time; and what effect the bond sales had on the credit and business of the people of the United States.

Third. To investigate and report as to the manner of disposing of said bonds, by what authority, and what contracts, advertisements, or proposals were made by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation thereto; what agreements or contracts, and whether oral or in writing, and whether publicly or privately, were entered into by the Secretary of the Treasury and any syndicate or person or persons with respect to the sale and purchase of the bonds, and the profits made or to be made by such syndicate or any person or persons connected with such syndicate directly or indirectly; whether any officer of the Government, or any person or persons for such officer, and on his behalf, and in his personal interest, and with his knowledge or consent, entered into any contract, agreement, or arrangement, directly or indirectly, with any person or persons, partnership, corporation, company, or syndicate, for the purpose of affecting the price offered or to be offered for said bonds, or any of them, with the intent and expectation to receive commission or personal reward by reason of such contract, agreement, or arrangement; whether such contract or agreement had any and what effect on the prices offered for the bonds, what the effect was, and who, if any person, profited by it, and to what extent.

Mr. HILL and Mr. ALLISON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HILL. I will yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon. I was not aware that the Senator from New York had the floor.

According to the agreement arrived at the other day, a portion of which was read by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], it was understood that the bond resolution should be temporarily laid aside from time to time for the consideration of appropriation bills. I now ask unanimous consent that it may be laid aside for the time being, in order that we may proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, the bond resolution, of course, not losing its place.

Mr. VILAS. I only want one ruling from the Chair with respect to that. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it now definitely determined that the bond resolution is the unfinished business and has taken the place of the joint resolution that was on the Calendar as the unfinished business? If it has, the Senator from Iowa is correct. If it has not, it will require unanimous consent that that also be laid aside. I simply desire to know the parliamentary status.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President—

Mr. ALLISON. I wish only to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Kansas the other day, when this agreement was made—the one quoted by the Senator from Wisconsin—expressly agreed that that might be done. If he now objects—

Mr. PEPPER. Certainly; the Senator from Iowa misunderstood me. I did not agree that it should be laid aside except by unanimous consent, the same as we would do in any other case.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HILL. "Or otherwise."

Mr. PEPPER. "Or otherwise," the Senator said himself. Of course "or otherwise" might even come yet.

Mr. ALLISON. I read from pages 3981, 3982 of the RECORD:

Mr. PEPPER. I wish to say to the Senator from Ohio that there is an agreement by unanimous consent to proceed, when that time comes, with the bond resolution; but we can doubtless arrange as to that matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will not disturb that arrangement.

Mr. PEPPER. With that understanding of course I shall not interpose.

Mr. ALLISON. The bond resolution is subject to appropriation bills by a distinct statement made by myself the other day when it was sought to make that resolution a special order. Of course the Senator from Kansas does not expect to go on with the bond resolution to the exclusion of the appropriation bills; at least I hope not. I do not understand that to be the order.

Mr. PEPPER. I understand the agreement to be just as it was made, Mr. President. There was a unanimous-consent agreement made a few days ago that yesterday at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. we should proceed to the consideration of the bond resolution, but yesterday at 2:15 o'clock we were not ready by reason of the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was on the floor in the midst of a speech. Then, by unanimous consent, the agreement was postponed or delayed until to-day at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. ALLISON. Then I understand the unanimous-consent agreement embraces the idea that the bond resolution is to be the unfinished business. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PEPPER. At that time?

Mr. ALLISON. At that time.

Mr. PEPPER. That is the understanding.

Mr. ALLISON. Giving way, of course, either by unanimous consent or otherwise, to appropriation bills.

Mr. PEPPER. That is ruleable, undoubtedly.

I submit that it is a fair understanding that the resolution when it became the regular order of business, as other resolutions and bills hitherto have been, would be subject to appropriation bills when they were ready for consideration. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that we may temporarily lay aside the bond resolution with a view to considering the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. STEWART. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WALTHALL. Will the Senator from New York yield to me to make an inquiry in relation to the status of the resolution?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. WALTHALL. According to my recollection, when this measure was last before the Senate the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] offered an amendment to it, and the amendment was pending when we passed from the consideration of the subject. The amendment was to strike out lines 1 and 3 and insert "That the Committee on Finance be directed," etc. I ask to be informed whether the amendment is now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the pending question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALTHALL. The amendment is pending, however?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir. The amendment was presented, but the pending question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the committee.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I should have preferred that the unfinished appropriation bill should have been taken up this afternoon on account of a personal engagement of my own. Beyond that it makes no difference to me when this question shall be discussed. Any Senator has a right to move to take up an appropriation bill if he sees fit to do so. If the appropriation bills are suffering because of lack of attention, any member of the Appropriations Committee can now make a motion to take up any of those bills for consideration.

Mr. President, the distinguished author of the resolution, assuming to speak in behalf of its friends, announced to the Senate, presumably by authority, to which I did not observe that the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] assented, that no one expected to speak in favor of the resolution. Of course I assume that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] did not intend to deceive the Senate. I must assume that he did not intend to deceive the Senate. I assume that he did not intend to allow the matter to be taken up under the promise that it was to be considered without debate on the part of its friends, or he would not have made that statement, which I repeat again in his presence, that the friends of the resolution did not intend further to debate it.

It is proper, probably, that the Senator from Kansas should control this matter. It is a Populist resolution, and who has any better right to control it than he? The resolution has its inspiration in the Populist party. It has its inspiration in hostility to all bonds whatever. The resolution, Populistic in its character, proposes to investigate not only the recent syndicate transaction, but the loan of February, 1895. The last three bond issues are proposed to be investigated by the resolution. In the two speeches which I made upon this subject when I was cut off by the expiration of the morning hour I commented upon the fact that the investigation is pressed without formal charges, without specifications, without any allegations of wrongdoing, irregularity, or corruption. I am not now speaking of the ingenious statements of the Senator from Kansas when he proceeded to discuss the resolution. The only tangible ground for an investigation stated by the author of the resolution was that the issuing of bonds should be investigated because there was a public curiosity to learn about them, and it was gravely argued in the Senate that that was a sufficient reason for ordering a special investigation. There is no amendment now pending for an investigation by a standing committee of the Senate.

The Senator from Kansas in his brief remarks made a few moments ago took it for granted that because the resolution was not laid on the table it is to pass. I was one of those who voted against laying it on the table, in order that it might be considered in connection with the resolution of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and that was the only reason. There are no two Senators here who agree as to the grounds of the proposed investigation or the results expected to be established. I said the other day that the fairest method would have been for the Senators who are clamoring for an investigation of the bond transactions under the present Administration to have come in here and specified in the resolutions themselves the precise things which they desired to have investigated and the reasons therefor, the grounds therefor, the allegations of unfairness, the allegations of illegality, and the allegations of corruption, in order that when the fiasco is terminated somebody would be responsible for the resolutions. I think it would have been better, for the reason that when the committee shall finally report, if it shall ever report, Senators will be precluded from rising in their places and saying, "We never charged this; we never charged that; we never charged the other. We did not say there was this; we did not say there was that."

The resolution is to be passed in the dark. It is to be passed, if passed at all, not because of specific allegations made against the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, but because public curiosity demands that the Senator from Kansas and his friends shall be gratified. The extraordinary character of this proceeding, therefore, may well be commented upon at the outset. This course is taken, as I said before, because when the result shall be announced Senators do not wish to be confronted with its meager results. If the committee shall find that there was no irregularity, then they will say, "Nobody charged irregularity." If the committee shall find that there was no corruption, it will be said, "Nobody charged corruption." If the committee shall find that everything has been done according to law and in good faith and for the best interests of the country, "Who said to the contrary?" will be the question. And the country is put to the spectacle of a legislative investigation with no one responsible for any distinct, definite allegation of wrongdoing, but an investigation just for the purpose of having an investigation, for the novelty of it (it is not a novelty in the Senate), for the fun of it, for the mere sake of having something to do in the near future.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator from New York understand that it is necessary, before the Senate may investigate, to have what is equivalent to an indictment? As I understand it, investigations are made for various purposes, sometimes to ascertain whether there has been fraud, and sometimes to ascertain if the methods are bad and might be improved by legislation. The general class of investigations is with a view to legislation, and there are many reasons for investigating where we would not indict for crime.

Mr. HILL. All that is true enough, but what I object to is that the resolution not directly, but indirectly, not having the courage to charge wrong openly, insinuates it, and before I get through I shall demonstrate it even, I think, to the comprehension of the Senator from Nevada. It is preferred, instead of making formal allegations, to take the gossip of the street, to take newspaper insinuations rather than formal charges.

I am not going to spend any further time upon the first point of inquiry which the resolution suggests. The first thing which the Senate is formally to authorize the committee to do is to investigate the question of the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds. I say, or was proceeding to say when I was interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour, that the farmers of the Senate, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], had risen in their places at various times and said that the farmers deny the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds under the act of 1870, and the Senate is asked to pass a resolution which virtually casts doubt upon the authority of the Secretary to issue bonds. It is to investigate a question of law, not a mere question of propriety. It is to report by what authority the bonds were issued. That is the first point to be investigated. By what authority does the Secretary of the Treasury issue them?

Mr. President, the act of 1875 settles the question. It is conceded that bonds have been issued by previous Secretaries of the Treasury. It is conceded that the whole question has been examined over and over again. I say it is belittling the Senate to authorize at this time and under these circumstances a committee formally to investigate the question of the authority by which the bonds were issued. All that anyone has to do is to read the act. It settles the question. For any purpose of maintaining specie payment bonds can be issued whenever it is necessary. It is a continuing authority, to exist after 1879. It exists all the while. It exists to-day; it will exist to-morrow; it will exist when the next Secretary of the Treasury takes his place.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator contend that it exists for the purpose of redeeming Treasury notes issued under the act of 1890?

Mr. HILL. Not necessarily. The act of 1890 stands by itself. No question is raised in regard to it here. It is not pertinent to this discussion.

Mr. STEWART. Have not bonds been sold to buy gold to redeem Treasury notes issued under the act of 1890?

Mr. HILL. Under the provisions of that act the Secretary of the Treasury has a right to take any funds in the Treasury for that purpose. The bonds were issued under the act of 1875.

Mr. STEWART. Have not the proceeds of the sale of bonds been used to a certain extent to redeem Treasury notes issued under the act of 1890; and if so, by what authority was it done?

Mr. HILL. The act of 1890 stands by itself, and I will come to that question before I am through with the remarks which I shall submit upon this question. I first wish to analyze the resolution. The attention of Senators has not been particularly called to it.

It provides—

To investigate and report specially what amount of available funds, classified, was in the United States Treasury and on deposit in other places, subject to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury at the time the bonds were sold or offered for sale.

All those facts can be found in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. They can also be ascertained, if anyone desires information upon the subject, by a simple resolution of inquiry presented to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The next question to be investigated is—

Whether there was or was not coin enough on hand to meet all coin obligations of the Government due at the time said bonds were sold or when they were offered for sale.

That involves the whole question as to what currency bonds shall be paid in. It involves the whole question of the financial policy of the present Secretary of the Treasury. My point is that whether or not you agree with the Secretary of the Treasury, there is no question to be investigated. What has been done in pursuance of the law everybody knows. The annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury show what has been done. Special reports have been made here from time to time detailing all the operations of the Treasury, and therefore it is silly, it is undignified, it is unworthy of the Senate, to appoint a special investigating committee to inquire into facts with which every Senator in the Chamber is absolutely familiar.

The author of the resolution wants to investigate further:

From what persons or classes of persons the gold was procured with which to pay for the bonds.

The men who bought the bonds and paid gold for them produced the gold. Is it proposed to investigate the private affairs of bond bidders? Is it proposed to have them tell the public where they procured their gold, from what sources? If the author of the resolution simply desires information as to whether the gold came from the public Treasury, that is one thing; but if he wishes to inquire as to all sorts of places from which the private bidders obtained their gold, in the first place, I say it is unworthy of the Senate to enter upon such an inquiry, and in the second place, you have no legal authority so to do.

Before I am through I shall call the attention of the Senate to the fact that you have not even provided any process to compel the attendance of witnesses. The committee is to make an investigation haphazard; it is to inquire from Tom, Dick, or Harry, wherever it can get information. You have not even provided for the subpoenaing of a single witness, although the committee is to obtain and report to the Senate where the purchasers procured their gold with which to buy the bonds.

The resolution proposes to inquire further—

What agreements or contracts, and whether oral or in writing, and whether publicly or privately—

I ask the Chair whether the words "and secretly" are now in the resolution. The resolution has been modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the words "and secretly" were stricken out.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator from New York permit me at this point?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. PEPPER. On page 1845 of the RECORD for February 18 the Senator will see that I asked permission to modify the resolution. I will read the modification, so that Senators will all understand it.

I ask the privilege of making two or three slight amendments to the resolution. On page 1, line 1, after the word "Senators," strike out the words "not more than two of whom shall belong to one political party"; on page 2, line 19, after the word "privately," strike out the words "and secretly"; in line 20, after the word "any," strike out the word "other" and insert "syndicate or," and in line 21, after the word "bonds," insert "and the profits made or to be made by such syndicate, or other person or persons connected with such syndicate, directly or indirectly."

Mr. HILL. The Secretary did not read the latter part—although perhaps he did.

Mr. President, everybody knew that those bonds had been issued in pursuance of the first syndicate contract. Everyone knew that in the last sale there was no contract. No responsible party has charged that there was any contract. "Publicly or privately," the Senator says. He strikes out the words "and secretly" for fear, I suppose, there might be an imputation against somebody and that the Senate, while he thought it might be anxious to throw some mud upon those officials, yet possibly might hesitate upon the word "secretly."

What have you left in the resolution? The committee is to inquire further—

Whether any officer of the Government, or any person or persons for such officer, and on his behalf, and in his personal interest, and with his knowledge or consent, entered into any contract * * * with the intent and expectation to receive commission or personal reward by reason of such contract.

The Senate proposes, through a committee, to investigate the question whether officers, from the Secretary of the Treasury down, have been guilty of receiving any commission or personal reward or pecuniary benefit from the sale of bonds. Who says they have? What Senator dare rise in his place and make the allegation? No one. When the report shall have been finally made, if made at all, I wish Senators to reflect that they seriously propose to investigate the conduct of one of the high officers of the Government and his subordinates in the Treasury Department upon a mean, contemptible insinuation that possibly somebody in and around the Treasury Department may have received some pecuniary reward, commission, compensation, or something else. Has anybody made an affidavit to that effect? Has anyone from any responsible source uttered the slander? Not one. Why, then, dignify this proceeding? Why enter into this allegation that may react upon those who propose it and upon the Senate itself?

Mr. President, has it come to this? Has the financial question become so strained that whether men are for gold or silver they can not treat each other fairly, respectfully, honorably, and that Senators can not differ from the honorable Secretary of the Treasury (and I differ from him in many respects) without dragging in a resolution which, upon its face, insinuates, while it does not directly charge, that somebody possibly has received some pecuniary interest from the bond transaction?

Sir, it is said it will do no harm. What would Senators around this circle say, what would the country say, if to-morrow morning I should offer a resolution to investigate the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PEPPER. I would not object.

Mr. HILL. We might, Mr. President. I say that the country would hold me responsible if I endeavored to insinuate in a resolution that the Senator had misused any of the powers of his office here. I might insinuate that there had been favoritism. I might insinuate that there had been abuse of power, and I dignify that charge by the offering of a resolution of investigation. The Senator says he would not object. Yet the country in reading that resolution in the next morning's papers would ask, "Why is this charge made? There must be something to it, or an honorable Senator would not have offered the resolution."

So, sir, if the pending resolution carries any weight at all, if the Senate of the United States passes a resolution to see whether the Secretary of the Treasury or his subordinates have not received some commission or compensation upon this subject, will not the public, reading it, say it can not be possible that the Senate has proceeded to pass such a solemn resolution without any charge whatever, without any proof, without an affidavit, without anything worthy of the name of evidence? The people of the country would be apt to say there must have been something behind it or to it. Yet, I repeat, and I pause for a reply, where is the Senator who rises in his place and says he expects to prove that Mr. Carlisle or any of his subordinates obtained one dollar of advantage or a penny of pecuniary reward or compensation of any character? I pause for a reply.

Mr. ALLEN. That is not the question at all.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Nebraska, another Populist, in favor of this resolution, says that is not the question. What is the question? What is the question we are going to investigate? You have not read the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. I will state to the Senator one question that ought to be investigated, and I do not connect the name of any person with it.

Mr. HILL. We are talking about this particular question now.

Mr. ALLEN. The charge was made in New York papers at the time, and I suppose they are reliable—

Mr. HILL. It depends on the one.

Mr. ALLEN. They are printed where the Senator lives. They are in a position to know, if anybody would know. The charge was that about $18,000,000 has been made out of the four different bond issues within the last two years, and that there was a secret understanding or a secret agreement between the Treasury Department (a copy of which agreement was published in the New York World, and I will produce it at the proper time) giving power or contracting with J. Pierpont Morgan as the agent of certain foreign money lenders for the sale of the bonds in a lump to him for those he represented. I ask the Senator from New York if he does not believe the question whether there was an illegal sale of the bonds is not worth investigating when it involves about $18,000,000 of public money, and why he can object to an investigation that will either disclose that fact or will disclose to the world, to the people who have a right to know the truth, that there is nothing at the bottom of the charge as it has been stated in New York papers?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, if the Senate of the United States is to proceed to investigate all the insinuations that are contained from time to time in the New York papers it will have its hands full. In the first place, no New York newspaper or other reputable newspaper in any other place in the country has made any specific allegation pertaining to this particular subject.

Mr. ALLEN. I beg to correct the Senator. I am not going to help him kill time, however, for a great while; but I beg to correct the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. What particular paper made the charge?

Mr. ALLEN. The New York World, for one. I think I have the paper in my committee room now. I will get it at the proper time, and other papers have charged that there was at least $10,000,000 to be made out of the last $100,000,000 issue of bonds, according to the original contract between the Government officials and the agent of the bond syndicate, a portion of which was destroyed by the popular clamor, causing the bonds to be offered at public sale at some five or six different places in the country, which the Administration gave to the country as a popular loan.

Now, that charge was made. It stands uncontradicted. Is it not worth investigating? I submit to the Senator, who is usually very candid, but who grows as mad as a massasanga in August when any question of this kind is broached, whether private individuals can make contracts with Government officials by which $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 are made upon a single transaction? If the charge be true or not, I submit whether these Government officials have the slightest power to issue the bonds of the United States for any purpose? I am one among the number who say (and I believe I can demonstrate it to twelve jurymen who would take an oath to determine the question upon the evidence submitted) that whenever Mr. Carlisle issues a Government bond of this nation he does it without a statute authorizing him to do so.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Nebraska started off with the allegation that some New York newspaper had intimated that some money had been made in the purchase of bonds; that $18,000,000 had been made in one minute, and $10,000,000 in another minute.

Mr. ALLEN. Ten million dollars on the last issue and $18,000,000 on all the issues.

Mr. HILL. I have never heard one of these men who criticize the transaction who ever stated the amount twice alike. Finally, after saying that he has some article somewhere else than here, and therefore we do not know the precise language of it, he winds up with the question whether I think there ought to be any objection to investigating by what authority the bonds are issued, and he volunteers his opinion as a farmer (because that is the capacity in which he last announced himself) that he does not believe there is a law for it, and that he could convince twelve jurymen that there is no law for it. Well, we do not usually try questions of law before a jury. It is not done in New York State, and I do not believe they do it out in Nebraska.

Mr. President, the courts are open, if you can convince one court of the United States. The courts are open; institute your proceeding.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the Senator from New York a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HILL. Was the Senator from Kansas, who is usually a very truthful man, authorized to say that there was going to be no one to participate in the debate upon his side?

Mr. ALLEN. That is running away from the question.

Mr. HILL. I am not; I am getting right to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not going to dispute with the Senator on his proposition of law as to trial of cases in New York, because the experience of Tweed and a few other persons in that State shows that they have pretty peculiar ways. The past history of New York litigation, especially in the punishment of those who have been guilty of crime, may be said to be somewhat in the dark, at least. I submit to the Senator from New York, who is a lawyer and a bimetalist as I am a farmer, that we do try mixed questions of law and fact before a jury.

Mr. HILL. You must not get them too mixed, though.

Mr. ALLEN. That is always done. The Senator never tried a case in his life before a jury that he did not try precisely that proposition. I submit to his candor as a lawyer (because I know or believe him at least to be a very great lawyer, a lawyer of large experience), that he ought to know and I believe he does know that it is impossible to impeach the Secretary of the Treasury before any court of this country. The moment it is done that moment he comes in with a plea that he is one of the chief executive officers of the nation, and that he is not subject to be brought into court to determine his official action, and he goes acquitted. Now, is not that true?

Mr. HILL. There is more than one way to raise the question of the validity of a bond.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator if that is not true?

Mr. HILL. The question as the Senator stated it is not true. Before I get through I am going to show that this investigation is in aid of one of the speculative lawsuits brought against the Secretary of the Treasury on the very day that this bond resolution was expected to be discussed here; and I am going to show that somebody thinks differently from the Senator from Nebraska and has actually brought a suit in the courts of the District of Columbia over the question of these bonds.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from New York knows that in hundreds of different instances in the history of this country it has been universally determined that an officer of this character can not be impeached and brought into court, and that a plea to the jurisdiction of the court is sustained without any further investigation. There is not an exception to the rule.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator from Nebraska thinks he can convince a jury the House of Representatives is open to him. That is a pretty big jury. The House of Representatives is composed of men not of the political party of the Secretary of the Treasury; they are his opponents. If the Secretary of the Treasury has issued any bonds illegally, and the case is so plain and so clear as my friend from Nebraska says it is, why not present it by impeachment? Then my friend here can try the question and sit as a jurymen on the trial of John G. Carlisle because of willfully issuing bonds without any authority of law. That is an impeachable offense, is it not?

The trouble about it is that these men have no sort of confidence in their position. It is a part of the claptrap of the times. It is a part simply of an endeavor to get up a scandal in order to affect this political question. As I said a few moments ago, I think we ought to differ, if differ we must upon this financial question, without endeavoring to throw mud unnecessarily upon our public officials, who have enough to contend against under the peculiar existing political situation.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from New York allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HILL. I was alluding to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] to see whether—

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from New York remarked a moment ago that the House of Representatives is of a different political party from Mr. Carlisle, and I suppose from Mr. Cleveland. Does he pretend to say that a majority of the House of Representatives does not concur with Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Carlisle upon the question of the gold standard and the issuance of bonds to maintain it? Are they not, so far as that is concerned, practically the same political party—the gold party?

Mr. HILL. What a reflection that question is upon the House of Representatives. For instance, if the Senator thinks that upon the financial question they agree with the Secretary of the Treasury—

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator contend that it is a reflection upon the House of Representatives to say they are of the same party with him and his Chief Executive?

Mr. HILL. That is no reflection; but it is a reflection to insinuate that because of that fact they would hesitate to decide according to their consciences and their oaths upon a question of this character, if you dared to submit it to them.

Mr. STEWART. But the Senator has stated that they are of a different political party as a reason why they would investigate the question. I wanted to show that his reason is not a good one. They are thoroughly in harmony with him upon the policy of issuing bonds; they are as one. That destroys the allegation the Senator made—that they are of a different political party. The gold party has been one party for twenty-five years. They vote together; they act together; they defend each other as one man.

Mr. HILL. As the boys say in the newspapers, that is "important if true." The difficulty about the Senator's statement is that it has no foundation in fact. The Republican House of Representatives presented a bond bill here which the Secretary of the Treasury did not want, which the President of the United States intimated was not what he had asked. There has been no disposition upon the part of the House of Representatives to agree with the President or the Secretary of the Treasury upon the policy which they announced. On some things they do agree; on others they radically differ.

Mr. STEWART. Do they not agree that bonds should be issued and that gold should be bought to redeem Treasury notes and greenbacks? Upon that main proposition do they not agree? Is not their disagreement a mere matter of detail as to how the bonds shall be sold and what character of bonds they shall be? Upon the main question of buying gold to redeem greenbacks and Treasury notes is there any difference between the House of Representatives and the Senator from New York and the Executive?

Mr. HILL. A large number of the Republicans in the House of Representatives, for whom I am not authorized to speak, undoubtedly believe that if there is no gold in the Treasury with which to redeem your greenbacks, and no revenues with which to purchase gold, the President has a right under existing law to issue bonds. The question we were discussing was as to whether there was any question in regard to it. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] says he doubts it. I say go to the courts. The courts are closed, he says, to us; the Secretary of the Treasury is above the law. Then, I say, go to the House of Representatives, where you can organize an impeachment proceeding. Then he answers that they are substantially of the same party. The Senator from Nebraska who sits in front of me remarks that the House is gold bug. There it is. They make these allegations simply from the fact that there is somebody a gold bug. That covers everything, Mr. President.

The point I am making is that the Senate is not conducting itself properly, in my judgment, by seriously considering a resolution to investigate the legal question of the issuing of bonds. How is the question to be determined? A word upon that point. How has this Government been run for the last year? Why, sir, the Senate is a closely divided Senate. It is pretty difficult to tell what political party controls it. The Populists have now been recognized as belligerents, with full belligerent rights. They train first upon one side and then the other, and you never can tell who has got a majority of the Senate. They were recognized as Populist belligerents when they were given their share of public patronage in the Senate, when they were given an officer to guard the secrets of their room. Therefore there are three parties here. The Wilson law does not as yet bring an amount of revenue sufficient for the ordinary expenses of the Government. I am not now going to proceed to discuss who or what is responsible for that. I am speaking simply of a condition and not a theory.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HILL. Not right here; not until I finish my idea.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to yield.

Mr. HILL. Not just at this moment. Mr. President, the House proceeds upon the theory that the best interests of the country require that there should be more revenue, and it proceeded to enact a tariff bill called an emergency tariff bill. That bill comes over here and in the Senate politically divided that tariff bill is seized until, in the eloquent language of the President pro tempore of this body, it is as dead as Julius Cæsar. In the meantime there is nothing with which to redeem your greenbacks, there is nothing with which to secure the revenues of your Government. Will any Senator tell me what this Government would have done if the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, law or no law, had not issued Government bonds during the last year? Now I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I wish to say this to the Senator from New York, and it is in the nature of a question: The Senator deliberately advocated and voted for the unconditional repeal of the purchase clause of the Sherman Act, at the same time claiming to be a bimetalist. By the repeal of that act this nation has been deprived of $150,000,000 which would have covered every item of deficit which has occurred during this Administration. The Senator from New York and his party have approved, and the Senator is approving now, the open, stubborn, dogmatic, flagrant, violation of the requirements of the third section of the Sherman Act, which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem those notes in silver. If the Senator from New York and his party had not done that, and if the Secretary of the Treasury had observed the law, there would have been no deficit and no occasion for the issuance of bonds.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am not going to enter into a discussion of the question of the propriety of the repeal of the Sherman silver law. That law was indefensible upon any ground. The friends of silver scarcely defended it when it was pending here in the Senate. They opposed its repeal upon the ground that they thought something should be put in its place in recognition of silver. No one pretended that it would solve the silver question; no one pretended that it was a logical law; no one pretended that it was producing any benefit to the country at large; but those who felt constrained to vote against its repeal did so because they thought it was a fitting opportunity to do something toward a more general recognition of silver. No true friend of silver should shed any tears over the repeal of that law.

I was saying, when interrupted by the irrelevant question of my friend from Nebraska, that I think the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of being investigated by this Senate, deserves its thanks for his steady purpose of maintaining the credit of the country. You may differ with him as to what ought eventually to be done upon the silver question; you may think that he erred in the discharge of a portion of his duty; that is one thing; but it does not follow that it is proper to investigate, under the insinuation contained in this resolution, whether some of the money has not stuck to his fingers in the discharge of his official duty.

Mr. President, before I get through I think the Senate will see that they are proposing to enter upon an unwise course. I know every time we differ about some great question somebody comes into the Senate and says, "Let us investigate; let us have an investigating committee appointed," as though that were the panacea for all our difficulties. I shall call the attention of even the Senator from Nebraska to an investigation which he instituted with a great flourish of trumpets as to what it was going to accomplish, and then I shall show what meager results were obtained from it.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; everybody yields to the Senator from Nevada. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. The Senator says that there is nothing to investigate. I inquire of him if there has ever been a 4 per cent bond sold in the market since the resumption of specie payments at a rate that would have made the bonds which were sold to the syndicate in February, 1895, worth less than $1.20, that is, 20 per cent premium? The bonds that had eighteen years to run in 1888 and 1889 sold from 25 to 27 cents premium, and so on down, but none of them ever sold, considering the time they were to run, at a rate that would have made the market value of the thirty-year bonds which were offered less than 130. These bonds were sold at least 15½ per cent less than the market value, as it had been established for years, and as it was on the day they were sold.

Mr. ALLEN. That was the charge made, too.

Mr. STEWART. That was the charge, that on the day the contract was made bonds having about eleven or twelve years to run were selling from 111 to 112, making 1 per cent for every year, which has been about the average. Following that those bonds which have thirty years to run ought to be at a premium of 30 per cent; but no one has ever suggested in the public prints or elsewhere that the market value of those bonds on that day was less than 20 per cent premium. Shortly afterwards the same bonds sold for 23 per cent premium in the markets here. They went up to that figure. Of course they were depressed subsequently for the purpose of obtaining a further deal, but it was charged, and boldly charged, that they were sold at a rate that made from ten to twelve million dollars difference. That never has been denied by anybody. It has been in the public prints, all the respectable journals have figured it up, and no man has ever denied that charge.

It seems to me that the Executive would like to have an opportunity to come forward and show why he sacrificed from ten to twelve million dollars of the Government money and what the circumstances were which made him do it. I think the Secretary of the Treasury ought to desire an investigation to clear up that. It never will be cleared up unless it comes before a committee and he has an opportunity to make a showing why it was he did it. That charge is made, and it can not be denied. Every broker in the United States knows it is true. It is admitted everywhere. Now let it be investigated, so that we may see if it was done in some emergency, and what emergency there was requiring it, or whether it was done for some other reason.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, when the Senator from Nevada makes a special appeal to me for an opportunity for him to vindicate the President of the United States it is very difficult for me to resist that appeal. [Laughter.] I know his intense anxiety to have the President of the United States put right upon this question, and because I am resisting this investigation I shall allow the Senator from Nevada to impute some desire on my part to injure the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury.

I have heard the same old argument time and time again, that you must always permit an investigation; you must not resist it. No matter what charge is made in the public prints or elsewhere, if a Senator rises in his place and wants an investigation, investigate. It is asked, are you afraid to conduct an investigation? Invest it with all the dignity and power of such a proceeding on the part of the Senate of the United States, keep the public press full of the matter for years, else somebody may think there is something wrong. Mr. President, it is a foolish argument, it is a silly argument, it is moral cowardice on the part of this Senate, every time some idle charge is made here against one of our public officials, whether he belongs to our party or to the other party, to immediately dignify it with an investigating committee.

I do not now propose to discuss the question of market values. I know something of market values, and how they are made. I had occasion to look into this subject recently as counsel in a matter pertaining to taxation in the city of New York.

Mr. STEWART. I will ask the Senator just one more question. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. Is the Administration opposed to this investigation?

Mr. HILL. I am not authorized to speak for the Administration, and I say right here that I have never exchanged a word with any officer of this Administration, high or low, upon this subject, and I do not propose to do so. Sir, the Secretary of the Treasury has not even answered my respectful resolution. I oppose this investigation not because the Administration wants it, or does not want it; I oppose it as I should oppose any foolish, silly, or unnecessary investigation, which could only add disgrace to the Senate, in my humble opinion. I would oppose it whether the Secretary of the Treasury was a Democrat or a Republican. Before I get through I shall show that Mr. Carlisle is not the only man who has been falsely accused. I propose to take up the charges that have been made against other Secretaries of the Treasury, and to show how those charges have all fallen to the ground and how contemptible they appear now in reading the history of the country. I propose to show how other Senators then followed the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] when he was Secretary of the Treasury with all sorts of vile charges, and now, when you come to read them in the light of history, it is apparent how thin, how weak, how ridiculous, how contemptible they are. Yet we are asked upon this financial question because there are differences of opinion, because perhaps, the majority of this Senate are the friends of silver, to throw mud against every official who differs with you. I am opposed to any such suicidal, idiotic policy. I care not whether the Administration want this investigation or not. If you put it on the plane of cowardice, it might be said: "Oh, yes, give them anything they want on any allegation, no matter what it is." So far as I know, the Administration care nothing about it. My judgment is that if this resolution is passed the men who institute it will be covered with humiliation and shame and will deny that they ever charged anything wrong against Mr. Carlisle or his subordinates.

Mr. President, as I was saying when interrupted the last time by the Senator from Nevada, I had some occasion to investigate the subject of market values, and I discovered that the market in New York is made up by sales, or, if not by actual sales, by offers, and there are times when the market is made up by a single offer or a single sale. A single sale of a ten-thousand-dollar bond will sometimes fix the market for a particular day, and it is quoted all over the country that the market price of bonds was so and so because one bond was sold at that price.

Mr. President, when the question of market values was discussed in the Senate before the last issue of bonds was made, you recollect what was said in regard to it. We heard that there was a demand all over the country to invest in those bonds at 2½ and 3 per cent. A cry came up from Nebraska, a cry came up from Colorado, a cry came up from West Virginia, according to the junior Senator from that State [Mr. ELKINS]—the blacksmiths, the carpenters, the farmers, were all anxious to rush to take the bonds at 2½ and 3 per cent. Where were they when the bonds came to be sold? You could not find them; they had fled to the woods; they were gone; they had no gold; they did not want the bonds; and not a bond was sold except at over 3 per cent. These allegations are easily made by men who simply want to make their point in an argument, but when you come to investigate them their arguments are gone to the winds.

This resolution proposes to investigate, further, whether in the last sale of bonds there was any agreement entered into by which any syndicate was to have the bonds. Nobody rises in his place and says there was; no newspaper has made any distinct charge that there was; and it is proposed to investigate not only the question as to how much money was made by the syndicate, but how much was made by any person connected with such syndicate. If I bought a bond from the syndicate the next day after the bond sale and sold it a few days thereafter and made some money by it, I am to be called upon to show how much money I made.

I have already commented upon the fact that this resolution nowhere contains any authority to summon witnesses. You are going to ascertain all about what J. Pierpont Morgan knows from what he voluntarily tells you; you are going to investigate this subject without the power to summon a single witness; but even if you had that power, I deny the authority of the Congress of the United States to compel answers to any such questions? This is not the sugar investigation. The right to compel witnesses to answer questions in that inquiry depended upon the fact that the committee was investigating a violation of the privileges of the Senate, and was investigating the conduct of Senators which might lead to their expulsion. That was something which you had a right to investigate. It may be, although that is disputed, that you have a right to conduct an investigation, summon witnesses, and compel answers where you are investigating for the purposes of future legislation, but that is not clear. Then the object of the inquiry must be spread forth in the resolution itself. There is nothing in this resolution which indicates that the investigation desired is for the purpose of future legislation; there is nothing on the face of this paper to show any purpose except to gratify idle curiosity; that is all. And I say to the Senator from Kansas, when he comes to subpoena his witnesses and compel answers, if they refuse to answer he can not obtain any information upon these subjects.

I now propose, Mr. President, to take up the speech of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] giving the reasons why in the allegations set forth in the resolution, not charges distinctly and boldly set forth, but the insinuations, the reasons, the circumstances which he says lead properly to this investigation.

The Senator said:

Twenty-four years—

Quoting from his speech—

after the passage of the refunding act, and nineteen years after the approval of the resumption act, the Secretary of the Treasury in the face of a refusal by Congress to authorize the sale, proceeded to dispose of $50,000,000 worth of ten-year 5 per cent bonds.

The inference from that is that, without such express authority, no power existed, because the Senator says Congress refused to give the Secretary of the Treasury power, and in the face of that refusal the Secretary proceeded. The Senator conceals the fact that the Secretary had the power without the authority of Congress by any new legislation. Of course, if he was to proceed to act under some new power, he had no right to act unless Congress granted it. He was not claiming to act, and the Senator from Kansas knows or ought to know that the Secretary was not claiming to act under any new Congressional enactment—he was proceeding to act under the old resumption law. The Senator from Kansas said further:

Senators denounced the proceeding as unlawful—

Who? The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILMAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], to whom has been added the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. This coterie of Senators denounced it as unlawful. You have heard the old story of the three tailors of Tooley street, who got together and passed resolutions, the opening words of which were, "We, the people of England, demand so and so." These Senators say it is unlawful. What lawyer in the Senate of long experience who has the public confidence, what judge upon the bench, who among the great lights of the bar of this country has ever dared to venture the opinion that the power to issue bonds does not already exist? Not one. Then the Senator says further:

The people were surprised—

The people! These Senators always speak in the name of the people, as if the Populist party represented the people. Mr. President, I am tired of hearing these men talk in behalf of the people. They represent but a small fragment of the people. They are the deserters from other parties; they are the conglomeration of men dissatisfied with the old political parties; they have pooled their grievances; they have adopted the silver question because they think it is popular. They have no views upon the tariff question whatever. They have offered their votes here for sale, or rather exchange, upon the tariff question upon either side of this Chamber. They have no fixed, settled principles whatever, and the Senate of the United States is asked, deliberately, to pass this Populist resolution for an investigation on the eve of a Presidential election, to enable these men to throw mud at the Democratic party and the Republican party. It is about time, it strikes me, that the Senators who represent States interested in this subject should act together upon the great question involved in this resolution.

Mr. STEWART. If Republicans and Democrats now find it necessary to stand together, is this the first time it has become necessary for wrongdoers to stand together?

Mr. HILL. I knew you would not keep your word when you said you would not again interrupt me. You can not trust a Populist five minutes at a time. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Kansas further said:

The people were surprised. All of us were mortified. Within a year afterwards a hundred million more were sold without any additional authority of Congress.

The Senator speaks of that as if it were a most singular and suspicious circumstance. Why, sir, the President of the United States had only asked authority from Congress for two purposes. He only asked authority for the purpose of simply reducing the rate of interest and regulating the terms for which the bonds could run. That is all he asked. He had sent to Congress a special message stating exactly what he felt constrained to do. There was nothing secret about it, but everything was open and above-board. A grave financial situation confronted the country; the President told Congress of it, and asked for legislation, not because he doubted the power to issue bonds, but simply in order to save the people of this country interest, and that the terms might be made more easy so that the bonds could find more ready sale.

The Senator from Kansas proceeded:

The contract was entered into privately. The country knew nothing of its existence except through guesses and sensational charges of the newspapers. * * * The people were amazed and bewildered.

Again the people, the dear people, were amazed and bewildered. It was the Populists who were bewildered. The people kept a level head; the people saw through it; and saw that the President was endeavoring to protect the credit of the country.

The Senator said further:

The Administration was dishonored. The nation was scandalized.

Mr. President, how the hearts of these men bleed for the Administration; how the hearts of these men bleed for the country because the nation is scandalized! I say the object of this resolution is to cast scandal upon high officials. The Populist party lives and thrives upon disseminating scandal against the two old parties.

The Senator proceeds:

That some person or persons profited by this transaction through dishonorable conduct everybody believes and nobody denies.

My friend from Kansas makes a pretty broad statement when he says that. Of course when he says there was not any authority for and no necessity for issuing bonds, that it was not necessary to redeem greenbacks in gold, and when he goes further and says that it was done secretly and through bad motives, of course it would follow that in some way or other there was some dishonorable conduct somewhere in relation to it. The trouble is, the Senator is wrong in his premises, and therefore wrong in his conclusions.

As it was conducted—

Speaking now of the syndicate sale—

the press and curious persons have asked why certain bidders came in at the last moment and why one of them altered his bid within a few minutes of the hour for opening the bids.

Here we have it again, a reiteration by a Senator in this body, going upon the record, repeating simply the silly allegations of disappointed bidders.

The next day after the bond sale it was said that some bids had been altered just before the time. If they had not been presented before, had not the bidders a right to alter the bids up to the last moment of presentation? Of course they had. There is nothing peculiar about the bidding for bonds. It is like bidding for anything else. Any bidder has a right until the subscription list is closed to alter his bid. He can not alter it after it is presented, but he can alter it up to the very second of the time of its presentation.

Now, the Senator from Kansas says:

The people want to know all about it.

Again it is the people, the dear people.

A committee of honest, clear-headed men who will search for the truth—

He wants a committee of honest, clear-headed men. The original resolution would have included one of the Populist Senators. Then my friend the Senator from Kansas, after his speech, consented to strike that out, so that no member of the committee should be a Populist.

Honest, clear-headed men.

He struck that out, so that it is not expected that on the committee there shall be any Populist Senator. He says:

That somebody has gone wrong we all believe.

Who has gone wrong? What has gone wrong? Who asserts that there has been any wrong? What bidders so assert?

The bankers of New York had just as much competition upon this question as ever before. Syndicate was against syndicate. There was the Morgan syndicate upon the one side and the Stewart syndicate on the other. If the Morgan syndicate got any advantage it would have hurt the Stewart syndicate. Those men have made no complaint. Those men who made their bids, who represented contending and conflicting interests, have offered no complaint here. They have demanded no investigation.

One of the large bidders was the New York Life Insurance Company, which took $10,000,000 of the bonds regardless of any syndicate, and wanted more. They have no complaint. No; it is the mere politician who makes complaint. It is the men who desire to make political capital by assailing some public man. They are the men who complain. Nobody else complains except a man who wants to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to settle with him in order to make some money.

Then he says further:

In the next place, it is alleged and believed by thousands and millions of people in this country—

There is nothing small about the Populist party. It always speaks in behalf of thousands and millions of people—

by members of the House of Representatives and by members of this body, that there was coin enough in the Treasury at the time the sales were made to pay off every obligation of the Government due at that time—every one.

There was not enough gold in the Treasury to redeem the greenbacks. We may differ with the Secretary of the Treasury as to what coin the greenbacks should be redeemed in. That is a question which need not necessarily involve our loss of respect for the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury redeemed the greenbacks in gold in pursuance of the policy of the Government, for the purpose of maintaining the credit of the Government. I know there are those wise financiers who say that he should have paid them in silver. I know there are those men who think it is unwise to keep up the present gold standard, which is the standard according to law. They see no harm in to-morrow redeeming in silver all the greenbacks presented. Whether or not it would put gold to a premium they do not know, and they do not care. So anxious and zealous are they for the silver cause that they want silver used to the largest possible extent.

Undoubtedly, sir, there are many people in the country in favor of that idea. Be that as it may, it is a question about which honest men may well differ, and which will come up for solution hereafter. The Secretary of the Treasury believes in the policy of maintaining the gold standard, and he believes that the way to maintain the gold standard is to redeem the paper money in gold when demanded. You may differ with him and say it is unnecessary; you may think it would not send gold to a premium if he paid silver; but you have no right to say that he is dishonest because he differs with you. You have no right to say that he deserves investigation because of that fact. You have no right to insinuate that possibly some of the commissions have found a place in his pocket simply because you differ with him.

I do not propose at this time to discuss the gold and silver question proper. It is a great question, worthy of the consideration of the best minds of the country. It is a question upon which there has been honest difference of opinion for many years, and doubtless will be for many years to come. I have no words of criticism or censure to make as to the man who honestly differs with me upon this subject. I can discuss the question with an adversary without at all impugning his motives, but I have nothing but contempt for the man who can not discuss the question without conceding to his adversary the same honesty of purpose that he claims for himself.

I am not going to anticipate the issue of the great silver question. It is now being discussed in all the villages and hamlets of this great country. Men are taking issue upon one side or the other. This Administration, whether wisely or unwisely I do not stop now to inquire, has said that it found the gold standard when it came into power and that that standard must be maintained, in its judgment, until it is changed by act of Congress. So long as that standard exists Mr. Carlisle and the President think it is their duty to maintain it. They think that when our paper currency is presented for redemption it should be paid in gold to preserve the credit of the country. They may be wrong; you may differ with them; but, sir, I think it is unworthy of any true friend of silver to array himself upon the side of men who offer the investigating resolution as an effort to undermine them in the popular approval and support of the country.

Nothing can come of it. I am not here to pass any eulogy upon those men. I say I differ with them in some features of this question, unnecessary now to inquire into, but I am here to say that, in my humble judgment, in this transaction they have endeavored to do what they have believed to be right. I believe they have sought honestly to preserve the credit of the country. I believe they think that the preservation of the gold standard is essential to the welfare of the country, and as executive officers they think they are bound to maintain it.

The majority of the Senate may differ with them. Let it be an honest, respectful difference. Let it not find shape in angry attacks upon them, in attacks upon their honesty, in attacks upon their integrity, in attacks upon the legality of their acts. So much I deemed I ought to say in behalf of those officials.

I sometimes think that we carry the investigation business too far. Every little while some one writes me asking for an investigation into this matter or the other. They have seen the efforts of the Senator from Kansas and other Senators from time to time to investigate every conceivable subject, and therefore we are overwhelmed from time to time with applications for unnecessary and useless investigations. It was only a year and a half ago that the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], after he had become a Populist, rose in his place and offered a resolution to investigate the question as to what Senators around this circle owned national-bank stock. Seriously he plead for that resolution. I had the honor to make some remarks in opposition to it. It finally went to the tomb of the Capulets, which is the Calendar, and there it rests. But it was at the height of the silver fight, and blood was up on both sides. It was said that some of those who were advocating silver were mine owners, and that fired the Senator from Nevada and he introduced a resolution, which I shall not take the trouble to read, in which he deliberately proposed to have an investigating committee appointed to bring in the names of the Senators in this Chamber who happened to be so unfortunate as to own national-bank stock.

What a cowardly proceeding it would be to oppose that investigation! What are you afraid of? I was not afraid of anything. I have never owned a dollar of stock in national banks or any other kind of stock. I opposed it upon the general principle that a Senator has a right to own national-bank stock. He has a right to own any other kind of stock that he wants to hold. He should not legislate in regard to the particular bank in which he is interested, but he has a right to own bank stock and mining stock. He has a right to own railroads; he has a right to own newspapers; he has a right to own farms; he has a right to raise crops—cotton, wheat, and everything else—as to all of which we legislate, of course; and yet it remained for the Senator from Nevada to rise in his place and propose deliberately to investigate how many Senators owned bank stock, in order that some reflection might be cast upon their votes of the financial question—a silly, ridiculous, contemptible proceeding, unworthy of grave and reverend Senators.

Must we investigate everything that is done? The investigation business is contagious. I observe that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] is giving me some attention, and I have a letter here (the handwriting is a little poor) which comes from God's own country, down in Mississippi:

LEXINGTON, MISS., February 24, 1896.

MR. DAVID BENNETT HILL,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am an American Democrat—

That is good—

who unquestionably sent Mr. Page M. Baker, editor of the Times-Democrat, New Orleans, La., a silver dollar, $1, in registered letter No. 41, November 6, 1896, to renew my subscription to his most valuable and reliable Democratic journal, the New Orleans Weekly Times-Democrat, for one year. But I have not received a copy of the Times-Democrat for above said $1 to date. I am in favor of you for President of the United States in 1896—

The man has considerable sense [laughter]— instead of any one of the Republicans in this country. But I am opposed to the reelection of Mr. Grover Cleveland as President of the United States in 1896. That I have not received a registry return receipt for registered letter No. 41 is undoubtedly very strong evidence that Mr. Page M. Baker, of the Times-Democrat, New Orleans, La., has not received registered letter No. 41 and above said silver dollar which it contains.

I sent Mr. Joseph Pulitzer, editor the World, New York City, N. Y., some silver money in each of the two registered letters, Nos. 18 and 27, which I wrote him October 17, 1892, and October 22, 1892, but that I have not received a registered return receipt for either of the two above said registered letters is unquestionably evidence that the editor of the World has not received the two above said letters and money.

The above said money which I sent Mr. Joseph Pulitzer, of the New York World, in the two above said registered letters, was for the Democratic national Western campaign fund of 1892.

[Laughter.]

We know that Mr. Pulitzer was sent the money, but what he did with it does not yet seem to be disclosed—

I think that the silver money which the above said registered letters contains has been lost or stolen—

A serious charge, Mr. President—

That the parties to whom it was addressed has not received it—

That exculpates Mr. Pulitzer—

Please investigate the matter in regard to above said silver dollar which I sent the editor of the Times-Democrat, New Orleans, La., and also investigate the matter in regard to the silver money as stated above which I sent the editor of the World in the two above said registered letters of October, 1892. Find the money which all three of the above said registered letters contains, and then have the result of your investigation published in the New York papers.

Very respectfully,

SAM SANDERS.

[Laughter.]

I submit this letter to the Senate because you might as well make this an omnibus investigation and include every charge that may be proposed during its incumbency. Further than this I have the following petition:

To the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

Your petitioners, citizens of the State of New York, respectfully and earnestly ask your honorable body, by appropriate legislation, to provide for a national commission, for an impartial, thorough investigation of the subject of social vice, in all its phases, its relations to labor and wages, to marriage and divorce, its effects on individuals and the general welfare of the people, and its general, economic, criminal, physical, and moral aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, the public health, and morals; and also to inquire into the practical results of legislation and the various methods relied upon for the repression of the evil in the several States and Territories in the United States, and in the District of Columbia.

A good many people sign it, giving their residences. I desire to have the petition go in the RECORD for the purpose of showing that the investigation business, started by the Populist Senators in this body, has led to suggestions of investigations of all kinds and character, and no one knows where it will end.

I have also a letter from citizens of Brooklyn, members of the International Association of Machinists:

BROOKLYN, March 26, 1896.

Hon. D. B. HILL, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., members of Lodge 323, International Association of Machinists, would like to see you use your influence in having a committee of investigation appointed to look into and investigate the treatment our members are receiving in the Brooklyn Navy-Yard. We hope to be favored with an answer as to your opinion in the matter.

It is signed by the secretary and the treasurer. Every conceivable matter is to be investigated by the Senate of the United States with or without charges except those general in their character.

I have already said that I do not think there is anything here worthy of investigation. We may differ as to law, we may differ as to the propriety of bond issues, we may think that the bullion in the Treasury should be coined, but the bonds have been sold. The last sale was made in the public market. There is nothing to investigate. Those who predicted that a majority of the bonds would be sold at a rate equivalent to 3 per cent have been mistaken. Are we to investigate every idle charge made?

I hold in my hand now some interviews with the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who honors me by his presence, making serious allegations affecting the purity of the primaries of our country in the great contest for the Presidency now pending. I insist upon it that the Senator's allegations shall be treated seriously. I know that the Senator rises in his place on many occasions and indulges in a good jest and a good joke, which we all duly appreciate, but I call the attention of the country to the fact that recently in two public interviews serious allegations were made against those who are pushing the candidacy of Mr. McKinley for the Presidency.

I am not here to say one single word against Mr. McKinley. I admire the man in many respects. He has the courage to say that he is a candidate for the Presidency. He aspires to that high office. He does not, like other candidates, say he is in the hands of his friends; that he is waiting for the people to summon him.

I admire him because he appeals to his friends throughout the country and asks their support. My experience is that the man who is in the hands of his friends usually winds up by finding himself in the hands of his enemies. Mr. McKinley has a right to aspire to the Presidency. I supposed he was making an honorable canvass for the high office. I was startled to read in the morning paper—the Post of this city, which I usually read before breakfast—an article headed—

Campaign of Boodle—Can the Republicans Meet the "Fat-Frying" Issue Again—Major McKinley's Managers—

These are the headlines—

A Widely Extended Levy upon the Country's Protected Interests—Deplored by Senator Chandler.

Those allegations have been spread before the country. I ask the Secretary to read the first of these interviews.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BAKER in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Washington Post, March 16, 1896.]

THE NEW HAMPSHIRE SENATOR CALLS UPON THE OHIO CHAMPION OF PROTECTION TO REPUDIATE THE METHODS ACCREDITED TO HIS AGENTS AND THEREBY PREVENT FURTHER GROWTH OF THE BELIEF THAT HE HAS VOLUNTARILY PLACED HIMSELF IN THE HANDS OF MEN "WHO ARE SEEKING TO NOMINATE HIM BY THE LAVISH USE OF MONEY"—AN ARGUMENT THAT IS "BEING PRESSED TOO FAR."

Senator CHANDLER of New Hampshire, always frank in his utterances, yesterday expressed his views with characteristic freedom with reference to the McKinley boom and boomers.

"What is thought and said among the Republicans whom you have met about the recent developments showing that money contributions are being solicited from the manufacturers of the East to help Mr. McKinley?" was asked.

"It has been very seldom that I have heard more indignation expressed on any minor subject of politics," said the Senator, "than within the last few days as information has come as to the extent to which these levies upon protected interests are being made. Anger is uttered by the friends of all other candidates and also by the most sagacious politicians who have no preferences as yet."

"It has always been conceded that it is fair politics to advocate Mr. McKinley because he represents such protection as was given by the bill of 1890, which brought to the Republican party undeservedly its widespread defeats in the fall of that year. In the return of the people to their desire for protection it is fair to argue that Mr. McKinley, by whose name the bill was called, will be an appropriate candidate for President. But even here there is a feeling that the argument is being pressed a little too far. Messrs. Allison and Reed were quite as important factors as Mr. McKinley in the handling of the bill of 1890, and Mr. Allison is certainly Mr. McKinley's superior in a knowledge of the necessary details which enter into the problem of a revenue by tariff duties. Conceding, however, that if a high protection candidate is to be desired Mr. McKinley's claim to that title is sound, it is a very different thing for his supporters to propose to carry on his canvass for the favor of delegates by begging money from the manufacturers of the West and the East and everywhere else to be expended in manipulating State conventions."

"AN ILL-ADVISED PROCEEDING."

"To invade Senator Quay's State with demands, oral and written, that the Pennsylvania manufacturers are under such obligations to Mr. McKinley that they ought to furnish cash contributions with which to secure the election of McKinley delegates to St. Louis seems to be a most ill advised proceeding. Yet the evidence seems to be clear that a systematic, widely extended levy upon the protected industries of the country has been projected and is going forward, to what extent remains to be discovered. Ever since the movement for McKinley began it has been rumored that Mr. Mark Hanna, now one of the Ohio delegates at large, has been expending money in Mr. McKinley's interest. There has been an unwillingness to believe this and a disposition to attribute Mr. Hanna's exertions to sincere and disinterested friendship for Mr. McKinley. Nobody now is so charitable. It is beginning to be believed that the McKinley movement is to be a boodle canvass from start to finish. This belief will be injurious to Mr. McKinley; it will be still more injurious to the Republican party, especially if Mr. McKinley is nominated."

"The issue will be made by our opponents whether we are to have a President who was nominated by 'fat frying,' by the money of millionaire manufacturers, and is to be elected by similar corrupt methods applied to the suffrage in the States."

"McKINLEY OUGHT TO REPUDIATE IT."

"Mr. McKinley ought not to suffer by unjust imputations of this sort. He ought to repudiate any such a canvass in his behalf. I do not believe that he wishes to stand in the unfavorable light in which he will be placed if the currently reported and now everywhere believed stories remain uncontradicted. I expect to hear from him without delay in a public utterance. If he does not speak directly or authoritatively through some reliable representative the belief will gain ground that he has placed himself in the hands of managers who are seeking to nominate him by the lavish use of money, and who will own him and make merchandise of him if he is elected. All Republicans sympathized with McKinley in his business misfortunes, and all over the country contributions were freely made to pay the honorable debts he had incurred, and to keep such a distinguished and honored leader of the party from insolvency. But it is now, by reason of recent disclosures, a pertinent inquiry: Who raised and handed those contributions, how large were they, and what is Mr. McKinley's present financial condition? Are the men who raised these personal contributions now going over the same ground they have before traveled, gathering money for corrupting State and district conventions; and is our next President, if Mr. McKinley is the nominee, to be controlled and dictated to by Mr. Hanna and a set of associates who have established their domination over a President by the money they have furnished for him and his uses?"

"A plain and explicit statement should be made by Mr. McKinley or in his behalf. 'Tell the truth' should be the motto. I believe Mr. McKinley can set matters right, so far as he personally is concerned; and for the sake of the good name of the party I prefer to see him do this rather than labor under the disadvantages now upon him in the canvass for the nomination growing out of these repeated and continuous collections of money contributions to repair or to maintain his personal and political fortunes."

Mr. HILL. In a few days thereafter some indiscreet friend of Mr. McKinley attacked Senator CHANDLER, to which he replied—and I ask to have his reply read—reiterating the previous chapter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Washington Post, March 23, 1896.]

CHANDLER REPEATS IT—CONFIRMED IN HIS CONVICTIONS OF A MCKINLEY BOODLE FUND—HE MAKES A FORMAL STATEMENT—WHY THE INTERESTS OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY DEMAND THAT THE OHIO MAN SHOULD NOT BE NOMINATED THROUGH THE ENFORCED CONTRIBUTIONS OF THE MANUFACTURERS—HE DEFENDS HIMSELF AGAINST THE ATTACKS OF CRITICS IN THE REPUBLICAN RANKS.

To the Editor of the Post:

The interview with me in the Post of the 16th has led to much misrepresentation of its terms. The New York World published with quotation marks words I never used. I said nothing unkind of Mr. McKinley personally, but called attention to certain methods of some of his managers and protested against their adoption. Every fact I stated had been published in the Philadelphia Times of March 10. It is a Democratic paper, to be sure, but Colonel McClure is usually accurate when making charges.

The substance of the charge made in the Times and reiterated by me was that the same men who had assisted in raising the money to pay Mr. McKinley's debts were calling upon the owners of protected industries to make contributions to help nominate him for President. Although the charge has been denied by General GROSVENOR and others, a review of the subject confirms my conviction that it is true. As bearing upon the question whether the collection and the use of the funds are for reasonable and legitimate nomination expenditures, I add that the fund which it was planned to raise was to be $250,000, a sum which could not be needed except for illegitimate purposes. In view of the effort to raise this large fund from protected interests, my points were very simple and clear.

Such a movement is unfair and unjust toward the other candidates, in whose behalf it is certain no such large sums of money are being raised or used. Messrs. REED, MORTON, QUAY, CULLOM, ALLISON, DAVIS, and Manderson are as devoted friends of protection as Mr. McKinley is, and the triumph of any one of them would be as sure a guarantee of the enactment of judicious and effective tariff laws as would be the victory of Mr. McKinley. For manufacturers to contribute large sums of money to be expended in nominating Mr. McKinley over any other candidate hitherto named would be a most unjust and uncalled-for proceeding.

The interests of the Republican party will be seriously injured by demanding and receiving such large contributions from the representatives of protected interests. It has been a continuous cause of attack by the opponents of protection—the belief that the system has been maintained, Republican victories achieved, and particular tariff schedules secured from Congress by the money of manufacturers. Whatever may be said in justification of reasonable contributions from such interests toward the expenses of Presidential and Congressional elections after the nominations are made, a system of using money to control Republican nominations for office would be scandalous in the highest degree, and fatal to all attempts to maintain the purity and honesty of the party organization.

These things I said. If the facts which were the basis of my utterances do not exist, the truth will appear, and no one will suffer but myself, for no one else suggested or was responsible for or knew of my statement. I shall be very glad to be convinced that I was mistaken. Moreover, if the attempt to raise the fund of $250,000 has been arrested by reason of the publicity given to it, I shall be equally rejoiced.

If, however, the facts are true, and to the natural popularity and strength of Mr. McKinley Messrs. Osborne and Hanna are to continue to add the expenditure in improper ways of large sums of money collected by them from the owners of industries protected by the tariff, thoughtful Republicans will do well to consider the consequences of a nomination thus made; the character of the canvass which is to ensue; the possible defeat which, even with the bright prospects before us, may come if we rush headlong into any egregious blunder, and the controversies which, even if we are successful, are to follow such an admission of the standing charge of our opponents that gross venality and corruption attend the maintenance of a high-tariff system by the Republican party, which charge we have hitherto truthfully denied.

To those who engage in vituperation of me on the ground that whatever may be the size of the money contributions which are being raised by Mr. McKinley's friends, or the use which is being made of them, it is injurious to the Republican party, and therefore a mistake for me to call attention to them, little need be said. Their argument recognizes no times or circumstances when it is proper for a faithful member of a political party to expose and condemn the faults and vices which develop in every party. This precept is a false one, and has never been heeded by me in a political life of forty years. Whatever may be said in favor of such restraint during the heat of a political canvass, after the nominations are made, there ought not to be two opinions on the question whether at all other times faithful Republicans should detect and make public, correct and destroy, dishonest methods which may be growing up in the organization, and which if kept concealed through a false notion of party fidelity will soon bring the party to destruction. That there is no way to keep a party pure and honest in its practices except by defeat at the polls is an unwise opinion. It should be so kept, and also kept in power, by the constant efforts of its true and courageous members to condemn and crush out in their inception all habits and practices which tend to the degradation and dishonor of the political organization. The Republican party is about to be returned, if it acts wisely, to overwhelming political power in this country. The party should begin its new career sustained by high principles and free from corrupt practices. It will be a fatal mistake, soon to be grievously punished, if we make a dishonest start.

W. E. CHANDLER.

WASHINGTON, March 21, 1896.

Mr. HILL. I have too much confidence in the Senator from New Hampshire to think that these allegations were made thoughtlessly or unadvisedly. I think he knows what he was about. I think he believed the allegations. I think they have not been answered. They have not been met. Abuse of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire is not an answer to the allegation. A reflection upon his motives does not meet the charges. The point which I make is simply that upon a newspaper allegation in a single newspaper (because when challenged this afternoon that is all the Senator from Nebraska could point to) we are proposing deliberately to investigate a high officer of the Government of the United States and his transactions on three different occasions. But here sits the Senate, with one of its esteemed, distinguished members making an allegation against a candidate for the Presidency, the leading candidate who is desired to be nominated, or if not against him, his friends, for a corrupt use of money to buy up a nomination and levying contributions upon protected industries for the purpose of procuring a platform and a candidate suitable to those interests and in accordance with its desires; yet no Senator here, not even the Senator from Kansas, has asked for an investigation. It affects the elective franchise; it affects the purity of our primary meetings; it is a stab at the foundations of our Government. When an amount of money, said in these allegations to be $250,000, is raised in the interest of a particular candidate for the purpose of securing his nomination, ought not some attention to be paid to it? Ought not some investigation to be had? I am not proposing any; I am simply suggesting it. Why has it not attracted more attention?

I said at the outset the Senator from New Hampshire was serious in this thing. We will strain at some allegation of wrongdoing in some newspaper against the Secretary of the Treasury; we will ask an investigation because the Senator says the people are curious and they want to know all about it, because there is no law for the issue of bonds—"A second Daniel come to judgment"; yet with a serious allegation made by a member of this body, published in the public press, charging that the man who is probably to be nominated as the President of the United States and his friends have entered into a combination with the protected industries of the country to secure a nomination, and it attracts no attention whatever. Not a single man upon the otherside, although opposed to Mr. McKinley, has asked for an investigation. Can not we upon this side take a little lesson from our friends on the other side, when even the civil-service reformers upon the other side, who dread to see the public service dragged down even upon a matter of little country post-offices, do not rise in their places and ask in the name of purity and justice that there shall be an investigation?

I say when the other side do not propose to investigate their candidate for office, although a member of this body makes the serious allegation, why should we Democrats upon this side hastily join this Populist combine to attack a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury? Let us learn a little wisdom from the men upon the other side; or if by some means or other we are afraid of this little Populist crowd who stand here holding the balance of power first upon one side and then upon the other, voting with us in one thing and against us on the next, and if we are obliged to have this investigation of a Democratic official upon these paltry and contemptible charges, let us add this other one. Let the Chandler charges be investigated, too. Let us see whether they can afford to remain silent. Let us do it now, before the heat of this political campaign shall come on, so that our motive will not be suspected. Let us do it in the name of the people. That is the way to do it, when you want to do a man's thing, when you want to stab somebody. Do not do it for the Populist party; be non-partisan. But that is not my practice, sir. If I have any allegation to make I make it. I think I may say my worst enemy never charged me with stabbing him in the dark. If I have anything to say against a man of my own party I say it openly and above board. When I have anything to say against my adversaries I say it in that way.

Mr. President, I say to you our Republican friends would not have ordered an investigation against a Republican Secretary of the Treasury upon such flimsy pretenses as these. I do not believe they will do it now against a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury. I have more confidence in them. I do not believe the two great parties here will dance attendance to this little crowd of Populists whose votes we seem to need in this Chamber now and then.

Mr. President, what have we heard here time and time again? From allegations of abuses in the burial of members to allegations about the eating saloon downstairs. All sorts of things have been dragged up here for the benefit of the Populist party. They do not like the issue of bonds. Of course not. They are against it. That is all right. They may believe in the silver policy and they may believe in the gold policy. That is all right enough. I am not challenging their motive; but I say that nothing is to be gained by this sort of political warfare. When there is something to investigate that is tangible, then I am in favor of investigation.

Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is not here. Two years ago he rose in his place, solemn, as he always is, and said that he had a grave accusation to make. In substance he said the Senate is a very corrupt body. Well, they have been talking that so much that I am free to say they have made a great many people believe it, I think. What was the allegation? The allegation was—he read from the newspapers—that every Senator was engaged in a speculation in sugar stock—a serious allegation. I thought then, as I think now, that it was an unwise proceeding. I thought I knew my brother Senators upon this floor. Ninety-five per cent of them had no money to speculate in sugar stocks or any other kind of stocks.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator from New York permit a question at that point?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. PEPPER. I am quite satisfied that the Senator from New York does not wish to do an injustice to the Senator from Nebraska. Does the Senator from New York mean to be understood as saying or asserting that the Senator from Nebraska offered a resolution to investigate the sugar trust?

Mr. HILL. I think it was the Senator from Nebraska. Who was it?

Mr. PEPPER. It was the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. HILL. It is my recollection that it was the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. PEPPER. Where the Senator from Nebraska came in was with an amendment that gave it a little more of a drag-net character.

Mr. HILL. Yes; just a little more of a drag net.

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator will allow me further, I will explain possibly how the Senator from New York came to fasten this particular proceeding upon the Senator from Nebraska. Within a few days after the newspapers made an attack upon members of this body, mentioning them by name, I, the Senator from Kansas, proposed a resolution of investigation. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], after an impassioned speech upon that resolution, moved to lay it upon the table, and it was laid upon the table. After that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] came in with his resolution.

Mr. HILL. I do not recollect that impassioned speech by the Senator from Maryland. My recollection was that it was the Senator from Nebraska. He spoke upon the subject. He offered an amendment. I have confused the amendment with the original resolution. No matter; the Senator offered another one. Of course he is not going to be left when it comes to the investigating business, and he offered another one. Whether I was present when the original resolution was offered or not I do not know. I was present when I heard the Senator from Nebraska speak, I think upon some portion of his resolution. I know the air was filled with allegations around this Chamber against the integrity of Senators. You would think from what was said that the whole Senate were engaged in a scheme of enriching themselves by speculating in sugar stock, and we must have an investigation. It was a Democratic Senate by a very close majority. The Populists were pretty nearly holding the balance of power then as now. It would not do to be cowardly about it. If anybody makes any charges you must yield right off and say, "Of course; have an investigating committee." That is the new theory, the modern theory of moral courage—to have an investigation every time a man makes an idle, silly assertion. I do not believe in it.

But by unanimous consent—I think it was pretty near that—they had the investigation. It was much advertised. The Senator from Nebraska was a member of the committee, which was composed of two Republicans, two Democrats, and a Populist—the same old combination again, the Republicans and Populists holding the balance of power, of course, to investigate a Democratic Senate. Democrats sat here and allowed the thing to go on, tolerated it, sanctioned it. What was the result? I will not read to-night (I will read in the morning if I have time) the first original charge, and I want to read the result. I say all over the country an anxious press was seeking to hold the investigation. It was a bitter scandal on this Senate. Eagerly they awaited its results. First I think it was proposed to have it in secret; but the press thundered at the doors, it must be admitted, the public wanted to know, the curious people wanted to know; and I think they admitted the Associated Press and the United Press reporters that the public might know all about it.

The investigation went on. I am not now going to speak of it in its detailed results except to say, put it all together, what did it amount to? All the Senators trailed upstairs to the committee room, humiliated that they had felt obliged to go out of respect to the committee, and every one of them was put through a lot of questions as to what he had done with his money, in substance, whether he had speculated in sugar stocks or not, whether he had bought any stocks for himself, his sisters, his cousins, and his aunts.

Mr. RAWLEY. And under oath, too.

Mr. HILL. And under oath, too. Oh, they would not take a Senator's word for anything. [Laughter.] Among the other charges made there was the specific charge against the same much-abused Kentuckian, John G. Carlisle, that he also was interested in sugar stock; that he had used his influence to aid the sugar trust—all lies made out of the whole cloth. This Senate deliberately proceeded to make an investigation because they did not want it said that they were afraid to investigate. What was the result? The sum and substance of it was that they found that one Senator—and I would not speak of it at this time except justice to the cause requires me to do it—one Senator, whose frankness we all admire, went before the Senate committee and said: "Yes; I did buy some sugar stock and afterwards sold it, and I would do it again; I had a right to do it; and what are you going to do about it?" He acted like a manly man, and I take pleasure in saying so, notwithstanding all the charges made about the great impropriety of speculating in sugar stock. To-day that distinguished Senator is the candidate, the favorite son, of the leading Republican State in this Union for the Presidency. He has as earnest and warm friends as any man who is now a candidate for the Presidency.

The other was the case of a Senator's hired girl, who had been speculating in sugar stock, and another Senator's son, 19 years old, had bought ten or twenty dollars' worth of stock in a bucket shop. [Laughter.] That was the result of the investigation. One Senator bought a little stock, and said he had; another Senator's hired girl had speculated in it—I think the Senator ought at least perhaps to have divided with the hired girl—another was the son of a Senator who had speculated in the stock; and that is all there was of it. [Laughter.] Every Senator here, eighty-odd of us, went before that committee, all under oath, and swore that they were not scoundrels, as if speculating in sugar stock was something terrible.

Mr. President, I speak of this simply to show that we belittle ourselves by such a proceeding. We belittle ourselves in the eyes of the world, the eyes of the people. There was no necessity for such an investigation; there were no circumstances which required it. The clamor did not cease even when the committee made their fair and impartial report of the exact circumstances. The press kept on because they like to create a sensation. The scandal mongers upon every side came to the front. All sorts of allegations about the sugar trust appeared in the platforms of State conventions against this Senate, nine-tenths of whom never thought of speculating in any sort of stock whatever.

I speak of these things, I say, for the purpose of asking my fellow-Senators to pause before they again enter upon any such ridiculous proceeding. That was an injustice to ourselves, and perhaps served us right for allowing it to go on.

What was the allegation against Mr. Carlisle? The committee unanimously exonerated him. There was not the least scintilla of wrong proved against him. The charges of the newspapers were shown to be manufactured; there was no truth in any word casting any reflection upon him; and yet that man, sir, submitted to it without a murmur, without complaint. He submitted to the allegation quietly, as befitted the dignity of his office. Now we are not seeking to do injustice to ourselves by an investigation of ourselves, but we are seeking to use the great power of the Senate to investigate a bond transaction simply because of some idle statements of the newspapers, simply because the majority of the Senate differ with Mr. Carlisle upon this great subject of silver, honestly differ, differ possibly with much reason—I do not propose to discuss that question—but, sir, I do submit that the cause of silver will not be promoted by any such investigation. The cause of silver will only be injured by such an unwise proceeding; the party to which we belong will not be injured by it; but it is unjust to permit these attacks to be made, because the very fact of investigation implies that there is some cause for investigation.

Now I will yield, but I desire to continue my remarks in the morning.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from New York yields for the evening, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, the Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 3606) granting a pension to French W. Thornhill; and

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw the motion to adjourn, in order that I may move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VILAS. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 17, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 16, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that we take up the bankruptcy bill for consideration on Wednesday and Thursday of next week. I make this request now, so that members may have timely notice of the assignment and may be prepared to enter upon the consideration of the measure.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman's request include a provision that a vote shall be taken at a certain time?

Mr. HENDERSON. We can arrange that when we reach the question on Wednesday morning. I thought it best that we should now assign two days to that business.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent—

Mr. BINGHAM. Before that request is put, I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] whether he will call for a vote on Thursday. Some of the Pennsylvania members who are very anxious to vote on this question may be absent on that day.

Mr. HENDERSON. That would be the intention, if we have two days assigned to this bill, unless by unanimous consent we be permitted to take the vote on Friday morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that Wednesday and Thursday next be set apart for the consideration of the bankruptcy bill. Is there objection?

Mr. PICKLER. The bill of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, as I understand, is the next thing in order for consideration. That would probably be out of the way before this business is reached.

Mr. HENDERSON. It will be nearly a week before the order I ask begins to operate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before passing to other matters, I would like to have an understanding on the part of the House that the vote on the bankruptcy bill be taken on Friday morning of next week. I find that a number of State conventions which gentlemen want to attend are to be held within a week or so; and if we should have a vote on Thursday it would embarrass quite a number of gentlemen.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no objection to the suggestion which the gentleman from Iowa now makes, but I would like to have it understood that a reasonable time is to be allowed for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HENDERSON. If this request be granted the time for a vote is extended, leaving us the whole of Wednesday and Thursday for the consideration of the bill. The fixing of the vote for Friday is really an addition to the time already allowed.

Mr. BAILEY. I heartily assent to the vote being taken at the time mentioned; I simply want an understanding that we shall have an opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. HENDERSON. That we will arrange in detail when we take up this business.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will not the setting apart of Friday prevent entirely the consideration of private bills on that day?

Mr. HENDERSON. The proposition is simply that we take the vote on Friday.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought the gentleman proposed to occupy Friday under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, no; I simply ask for a vote on that day. The House has already assigned Wednesday and Thursday for the consideration of the measure; but to accommodate a large number of members who want to be present to vote on the bill, I ask that the vote be taken on Friday morning after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. I now ask unanimous consent for the printing of a substitute which I desire to offer for the bankruptcy bill as reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir; but as it is not a proposition coming from the committee, it is necessary that the order to print should be made by the House. I am simply asking unanimous consent for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] asks unanimous consent that a substitute which he proposes to offer for the bankruptcy bill may be printed in bill form. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. If the gentleman has his substitute now ready, and will file it, it will be printed.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 2600) granting a pension to Mrs. Clifford Neff Fyffe—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 1011) for the relief of Capt. James Regan, United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MANAGERS OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HULL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Military Affairs—House resolution 160, to appoint four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. HULL. By order of the House adopted yesterday, it was arranged that debate on this resolution continue until 3 o'clock to-day, when a vote be taken. I understand that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] will control the time in opposition to the resolution; and I suppose that the time will be equally divided between the two sides.

The SPEAKER. One hour and forty-five minutes have been consumed by the committee and an hour and fifty-eight minutes in opposition.

Mr. HULL. I am perfectly willing that the opposition be allowed half the time to-day.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that will be considered as the order.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLUE. May I ask how much time there is now for debate?

The SPEAKER. Two hours and forty-five minutes.

Mr. BLUE. I would like very much, Mr. Speaker, for the House to be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad also to have the House in order.

Mr. TERRY. What has become of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. This is an extension of the morning hour, granted by the House.

Mr. BLUE. I desire to yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACY].

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman proceeds the House will please be in order, and the Chair will request gentlemen to resume their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. BOUTELLE. As the Chair seems to be looking toward me, I desire to state that I have not been engaged in conversation. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not refer to the gentleman from Maine by any means.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Two or three gentlemen around me seem desirous of advertising the fact that the Speaker was referring directly to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had no reference whatever to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The Speaker referred to me, probably. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no desire to call the House to order—not the slightest. But attention has been called to the matter, from the floor, that it is utterly impossible to hear what is going on. The gentleman from Missouri has the right to address the House without interruption; and since the attention of the Chair has been called to the matter by a gentleman on the floor the Chair is compelled to take cognizance of the fact.

The trouble is that each gentleman in private conversation on the floor seems to think he makes no noise. The Chair would be very glad if gentlemen would be in order, so that the gentlemen could be heard who are entitled to occupy the floor.

The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, the duty which I feel called upon to perform to-day is not a pleasant duty to me. It has never been a pleasant task to me to assail or make charges against anyone. It has always been unpleasant to me to speak ill of any person. I would much rather eulogize than criticize, especially when the person or management to be criticised is that of a soldier. But it happens sometimes in the administration of human affairs that criticism becomes absolutely necessary; and while I would infinitely prefer to proceed along the lines of an orderly investigation, I feel that I am not only justified in what I intend to say, but I believe that I would be derelict in my duty to the people I have the honor to represent here if I failed to say what I hope to say on this occasion.

The Soldiers' Home at Leavenworth, Kans., being upon the border line of the State which I in part represent, is always patronized, so to speak, by about as large a number of Missouri soldiers as are in the Home from the State of Kansas, in which it is located. Before coming here, and immediately following the election, I received a number of letters concerning the management of that Home. These letters continued to come, and contained information derogatory to the management of that Home. I never sought information calculated to produce any other than the highest opinion of the management of the Home at Leavenworth or at any other place. What information I have on the subject has been forced upon me; I have not sought it. But the position in which I have been placed has compelled me to take notice of it, and it is because of that fact that I to-day, in this discussion, occupy what is to me a somewhat unpleasant position.

Personally, I have but little acquaintance with the governor of the Leavenworth Home, or the Western Branch, as it is called. Personally, I have no acquaintance whatever with General Franklin, who is president of the Board of Managers of the Homes. Personally, I only know two members of the Board of Managers, and they not very intimately or very long. Hence it must be apparent that I have no personal feeling in this matter other than a desire to see these Homes, which have been built up by the munificence of a grateful people for taking care of the men who by reason of the years they gave to the service of their country are now unable to take care of themselves—that these Homes shall be homes in fact and in deed for these old soldiers and not merely in theory and in name.

Now, in presenting the facts which I wish to present to the House to-day—and I regret that my time will not admit of such a presentation as I would like to make—I will confine myself almost exclusively to what I find in the record presented by the Board of Managers of the Home. I have a number of affidavits here, but enough of them have been read in the hearing of the House to make it unnecessary to present any more. In fact, more of them would be merely cumulative, although more of them can be secured if necessary. I undertake to say that from the Home at Leavenworth 500 affidavits can be secured against the character of the management of that Home in so far as it affects the comfort and well-being of the inmates.

Now, against the character of the president of the Board I have no word to say. As I remarked a moment ago, personally, I do not know him; hence I have no word to say against his character personally. He may be all and more than is claimed for him by his most ardent admirers and friends. It is with the administration of the Homes, and that exclusively, that I have to deal, not with him, except in so far as he is personally responsible for the administration, he being the president of the Board. He is, in many senses of the word, the Board itself. This Board meets occasionally—I do not know how often in a year. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]?

Mr. STEELE. Four times a year, or oftener if necessary.

Mr. TRACEY. The Board meets four times a year, and in the intervals between the meetings the president of the Board is the Board itself. I undertake to say more than that, Mr. Speaker; I undertake to say that at the meetings of the Board the work to be done has been prepared and is presented to the Board by the president and secretary, and I find in looking over the reports and examining the proceedings of the several meetings held that not a single instance appears, as I now remember, in which the recommendations of the president so prepared and presented have not been agreed upon by the Board.

Perhaps this is true in all corporations where the president who is continued in position from year to year acquires such a hold upon and influence over the members of the board of directors that his desires are always respected. This influence grows imperceptibly, and it would not be strange if a man such as General Franklin is described by his friends should acquire in a series of years the influence over his associates on the Board that I have ascribed to him and which appears all through the reports. It is to this influence, as I am informed, that the governor of the Home at Leavenworth owes the position he occupies. Hence I am justified in saying that to a very great degree indeed, the president is the Board of Managers, and that his will is the law which governs them.

But aside from that it is said that General Franklin is a good man and an honest man. That may all be true. That he is an old soldier, and that is true; that he was a brave soldier, and I believe that to be true. But with all of that, he is the governor of a system of Homes containing within their walls from 17,000 to 18,000 old soldiers, every one of whom was perhaps as brave a soldier as he, and may be just as good a man personally as he. At any rate his (the governor's) position is a good one, furnished by the Government, paid by the Government, and it is the least that can be expected of him that, as president of the Board of Managers, he ought to see to it, as far as in him lies, that the position of these 17,000 or 18,000 old soldiers under his control, so far as the rules and regulations go, is made as comfortable and pleasant as it is possible to make it by the expenditure of the money placed in the hands of the Board.

Mr. Speaker, it is no small affair. These men, reduced to poverty, many of them friendless and homeless—it is no small affair to say that when they enter a National Soldiers' Home they shall meet within the walls of that Home the hand of friendship and the arm of support and sustenance, and that within its walls they should feel, while there, that they have indeed a home given to them by a grateful people because of the fact that they have given the best years of their lives that we might have a country. But is it a home when discipline is mentioned twice where kindness is mentioned once?

I find, in examining the reports of the Board with reference to the cost of maintenance, some remarkable facts. I call attention to the fact that the efficiency of the management must of necessity have a very close connection with the cost of maintenance. Now, in turning to the record, I find that General Franklin was elected in 1880. In that year, according to the report, the cost of maintenance per capita in the Homes was $118.23. From that time on until 1892 the cost increased. This was under the management of General Franklin. It increased in 1881 to $132; dropped a little in 1882 to $125; increased in 1883 to $137; dropped a little again in 1884 to $132; in 1885 to $138; in 1886, $125; in 1887, $138; in 1888, $132; in 1889, $144; in 1890, $141; in 1891, $139, and in 1892, $143.

This rapid increase in the cost of maintenance called the attention of Congress to the fact that money was being expended extravagantly in the management of the Homes. The Fifty-second Congress took no action, but in the Fifty-third Congress it was provided that an additional inspection of the accounts of the Homes should take place, under the authority of the War Department. Now I call the attention of the House to the rapid decrease in the cost of maintenance that has occurred since the War Department took a hand in the auditing and the examining of the accounts of the Homes. In 1892, as I said, the cost of the maintenance was $143.75. In 1893 it was $140.95. That small decrease occurred before the inspection by the War Department took place; but in the succeeding year, in 1894, there was an examination of the accounts by the War Department, and the cost of maintenance was reduced to $127.45. In 1895, under the operation of the same system of inspection, the cost of maintenance in the National Homes has been reduced to $115.80. Here, then, we have, from 1880 to 1892, a constant going up hill under the administration of the Board over which General Franklin presided all this time, while within three years after the inspection by the War Department began we have a rapid decrease from $143 down to $115.

I do not charge dishonesty to any member of the Board or to its officers, but I do charge that there has been a loose, negligent, and irregular method in vogue in the keeping of accounts of these Homes, and that the feeling has grown up that this was a corporation outside of the Government and outside of the control and authority of Congress, a corporation in which the members of the Board assumed to control, and deprecated interference.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me right there? I notice in the report of the Inspector-General of the Army to the Secretary of War, on page 23, the statement that the cost of maintenance for the Soldiers' Home at Washington for soldiers of the Regular Army is $197.89, or $80.25 per capita more for this Home in this city, which is under the supervision of the officers of the War Department right here, than the per capita cost in the National Homes.

Mr. BLUE. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask him a question, with the consent of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. TRACEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLUE. How much difference was there per capita in the maintenance of soldiers in these Homes after this Board of Management began to be inspected by the War Department than before?

Mr. STEELE. That was read by the gentleman from Missouri. Every man knows that there has been a great fall in prices, and especially on the leading commodities—a very great fall in prices.

Mr. TRACEY. There has been some fall in the prices of commodities since 1892, I will concede; but there has not been enough of a fall in the prices of products to account for the great difference in the cost of maintenance, which amounts to a good many thousand dollars each year in the expense of administering these Homes. If gentlemen will take the trouble to do a little figuring they will find that the difference in cost of maintenance per capita between 1892 and 1895, in round numbers $28, applied to the number present in the Homes in 1895 amounted to a saving of the snug sum of $461,440. Is that a badge of efficiency, or may it not prove that General Franklin is too good a man to be at the head of the greatest, most beneficent, and best-deserved charity on earth?

But there is another matter to which I want to call attention, and my time is growing very short. There are matters of detail in connection with the management of the Homes of which I regret I have not time to speak; but I do want to refer to the thing they call the Keeley cure, or the gold cure. I want to refer to that for the reason, in my opinion, based upon the testimony that has been forced upon my attention, the extent to which it is beneficial is yet open for discussion. While I will not say there are not men who have been benefited by taking the chloride-of-gold cure, I do say that the men who were patriotic and brave enough to take their lives in their hands and follow the old flag when it was necessary to do so, that those men ought, when they seek the asylum of a Soldiers' Home, at least to have the voluntary right of free choice to say whether they will take that cure or not.

I also want to say in this connection that while I dislike drunkenness and regret to see an old soldier drunk, more even than any other citizen, yet when I find him drunk, although he be lying in the gutter, there is that in him and in the past with which he is indissolubly connected that entitles him to my kind and considerate treatment and respect as a man, however much I may deplore his condition. [Loud applause.] These men when they of necessity seek a place within the walls of a Soldiers' Home in order that they may have food and raiment and shelter from the storms, are entitled to say of their own free will and choice whether they will take the Keeley cure or let it alone; and there is too much evidence of the fact that men have been compelled to take it as a matter of discipline.

Why, Mr. Speaker, in this report—and I have gone carefully through it from end to end—the Keeley cure is spoken of everywhere as a matter of discipline. Here is a line or two of the report from J. B. Thomas, governor of the Central Branch—

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRout). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TRACEY. I would like to have ten minutes more, if it can be given me.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, it is going to be absolutely impossible to give everyone all the time that he needs in this matter, and I do not want to give away any more time. I would rather that the gentleman's time should be extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, it can only be done by cutting off both sides, unless the vote is postponed.

Mr. BLUE. How much more time does the gentleman from Missouri want?

Mr. TRACEY. I would like to have ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. BLUE. I will yield ten minutes more time to the gentleman.

Mr. TRACEY. In the report of Central Branch Home I find this:

The Gold Club continues to exert an excellent influence in the Home, although the additions to it have not been as many as in former years.

Now I turn over here to another page in the report, and I find this astonishing corroborative testimony of that statement. Here in the report of the post fund it reads: "Sales, beer hall, $88,260.65." Certainly that Gold Club in the Central Branch Home must be located in the beer hall. More evidence of it exists there apparently than anywhere else. That sum paid for 1,765,213 drinks, or 4 drinks per minute for every hour of every day in the year except Sundays.

At the Northwestern Branch Home the sales of beer amounted to $40,045. At the Eastern Branch, in a prohibition State, the sales are not so large. The report reads:

The Keeley treatment for drunkenness is still a strong factor in the promotion of good discipline. Eighty-one members have taken advantage of the "treatment" during the past year and 408 since its first introduction.

That is the Eastern Branch. The sale of beer was $25,262.38. The gold cure at the Southern Branch is commended, but no figures are given as to sales of beer. The report says:

Our Keeley club flourished and grew to the number of upward of 200, then the interest therein seemed to lag and the additions were sporadic, amounting to only 8 or 10 per month, when the Board of Managers determined that the salary of the Keeley doctor must be paid from the profits arising from the price paid for the treatment (it had previously been made from the post fund); and the increase in membership not being sufficient to warrant this heavy expenditure, the doctor, in June, after being informed of the situation, resigned and left the Home, since which time the treatment has not been administered and, consequently, the gold cure at this Branch is now in statu quo.

This is at the Southern Branch. Under the head of discipline at the same Branch, where the population is in excess of 2,000, I call special attention to what is stated by Mr. Woodfin, the governor:

I am extremely happy to report that as the years go by and our men become older they become more easy to govern.

I want to call special attention to that fact, that as our men become older they become more easy to govern. And yet precisely the reverse is alleged as to the Home at Leavenworth, where the population is not greater, or but little greater, if any, than at this Home. This is unquestionably true, as every member of the House knows of himself—that men as a rule, as they grow older in years, lose much of the passion and prejudice, the hot blood and quick temper, which may have characterized their youth and their young manhood, and become more easy to govern, and yield to discipline with less difficulty and greater readiness. The same temper and fitness to govern which made this discovery at the Southern Branch would make it at Leavenworth and at every other of the National Homes.

But let us examine the reports a little further in connection with the Keeley cure, which I do not condemn, but which I insist should be left to the untrammelled choice of the inmates of the Homes, as to whether they will take it or let it alone. They should certainly have the same right to take the cure within the Home that they have on the outside, but they are not constrained to take it on the outside, and they should not be constrained on the inside.

It ought not to be regarded as an element of discipline, which in itself negatives the idea of freedom of choice, but as a remedy for disease which the few among the old soldiers who drink should have the right to freely take or refuse after they have entered the Home. But it is regarded and spoken of as an aid to discipline almost exclusively, and seldom, if ever, referred to as a remedy for disease.

Governor Stephenson, of the Eastern Branch, says of it:

The Keeley treatment for drunkenness is still a strong factor in the promotion of good discipline.

In spite of its virtue in that direction, however, a lively business in sales of beer was carried on at the old stand, and that, too, in spite of the frigid atmosphere of prohibition surrounding it.

At the Pacific Branch the "cure" was introduced in July, 1893, but had to be discontinued for a time for want of patients. But the preparatory establishment, the beer hall, was in operation, and during the year ending June 30, 1895, furnished 84 cases for the institute. This Branch reports the smallest amount of sales of beer, being for the year but $7,276.13.

At Marion Branch, which appears to be a fairly well conducted Home, Governor Chapman speaks as follows of the "cure":

The Chloride of Gold Club continues to prosper and is productive of good. Twenty-five per cent of the members taking the cure have relapsed.

That statement is given without a word of explanation, and is well calculated to engender doubt as to the truth of the statement made as to the result in the Western Branch, where it is alleged that only 16 per cent have relapsed. Another singular fact, too, is the difference in the cost of the cure at the Central Branch, where it is but $15, and the Western Branch, where it is $22.30. It is highly probable, from all the facts attainable, and allowing for the natural exaggeration of both the friends and enemies of the cure, that at least 50 per cent of those who take the cure relapse, both within the Homes and on the outside. Instances are not wanting of men who have been required to take the cure as often as two to four times a year, each time at the original first cost. In nearly every other business a wholesale purchaser receives a discount, but in the Keeley institute at the Soldiers' Homes, with its primary department, the beer hall, there is no discount. The same price prevails in both, no matter how often frequented. A glass of beer is swallowed, always at a cost of 5 cents, and the swallowing continues until an examination shows the candidate to be qualified to enter the institute, where, no matter how often he has been before, if he is at the Western Branch Home, he is taxed and required to pay the sum of $22.30.

In the Leavenworth or Western Branch Home, where there were 2,261 inmates on an average during the past year, about the same as the average at the Southern Home, or a little more, the amount paid for beer was $21,842.60, and the amount paid for the Keeley cure was $25,529.84, making a total of $47,372.44, every cent of which came out of the pensions paid to those men by the Government. The average cost to the total membership of that Home was $20.95, but inasmuch as less than 400 of the inmates took the cure in any one year, the average cost of the cure per member of those who took it was more than $100 a year, all of which money came out of the pensions of those men. How delightful it is to contemplate a place labeled a "Home," with one index finger, after you cross the threshold, pointing to the beer hall, where candidates are mired and groomed for Keeley, and another pointing to the "institute," where they are initiated and relieved at stated intervals of a large per cent of their pension money!

I say that is wrong, absolutely wrong; and I sincerely trust that the members of the House when they come to vote upon the pending proposition will think for a long time before they conclude, in the face of all these facts, to continue even as good a man as General Franklin at the head of the Board of Managers. He has been there sixteen years. Why is there anything wrong in asking that a change shall be made after that length of time? It is no mistreatment of him, no wrong to him, and I trust that the House will vote to substitute for the name of General Franklin the name of that Christian gentleman as well as brave soldier and patriot, Gen. O. O. Howard. [Applause.] I thank the House for its indulgence. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have a letter read in connection with my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROUT). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLUE. I yield the gentleman enough additional time to have the letter read.

The letter was read, as follows:

INOTON, OHIO, January 29, 1926.

DEAR SIR: I was at the Soldiers' Home yesterday and witnessed the burial of three soldiers, and never was I so shocked in my life. I had been around the grounds and saw how magnificently the Government had provided for the living soldiers. Fine barracks to dwell in, a splendid hospital, and the surroundings all beautiful and adorned by art and refined taste. A fine chapel and memorial hall, all simply elegant. I went upon the hill to see the burial, and never did I witness the like. I have seen men buried in the trenches, on the battle field; I have seen them carried out by the dozen and buried on the levees of the Mississippi, with their blankets alone wrapped around; but these scenes were witnessed in camp and field while war was raging, and it was the best that could be done. But here amidst the highest civilization, where every facility is at hand to make a burial decent, I saw the veteran soldier, the country's pride and honor, secure the burial inferior to any pauper in the State.

The three graves were dug in a row about 2 feet wide, 5 feet long, and 4 feet deep—dug in the wet soil of winter, the bottom all covered with water. The coffin, made of thin boards about one-fourth of an inch thick, after the old coffin style, was laid on two crosspieces, straps placed under, the pieces withdrawn and the coffin lowered in a pool of water, and the earth dumped on the naked coffin. I saw one of the corpses; he was a veteran 65 years old, his face was nice and clean, a white shroud covered an undershirt and encased his body. He was dumped in the water. I saw another veteran, a member of the league, and the veterans were out in full force to do honor to his burial—the coffin lowered into water and the wet earth dumped onto it. I asked one veteran how he liked the prospect ahead of him, and he said it made him shudder when he waked up at night and thought of his being buried in that manner.

I talked to the chaplain and he said there were no funds provided for a box for the coffin, and said there was no use for the officers in charge to request the funds necessary to purchase outer boxing, and I suggested if even a board was put on the top of the coffin. I did not know who to write to tell how much I regretted this treating the body of a soldier as a pauper dog, and I thought that you might take some interest in this matter. I know it makes but little difference what becomes of the body, and I thought of these men and of veteran soldiers standing there and seeing how their comrades are buried. How horrid it must be to contemplate, and I thought you might take an interest in the matter and see that provision is made in the appropriations to give the soldier a decent burial—such as everyone who has a heart in him would like to see.

But who cares for the broken-down veteran who is compelled to accept the gracious provision of a munificent Government. For mercenary purposes every man at the Home (in charge) is there. What sympathy! One day thus was put away last year. The chaplain and sometimes the physicians are in attendance; it was so yesterday, and not another official seen on the ground. But you can judge from what I have said that there should be some other provision made; examine for yourself, and then see that the soldier gets a decent interment.

Yours, respectfully,

E. V. DEAN.

Mr. L. J. FENTON, M. C., Washington, D. C.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] provides for striking out the name of General Franklin and inserting the name of another gallant officer of the late war. If the charges made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] are true, I am in full sympathy with his desire to purge this institution of any wrongs that may exist there. But, Mr. Speaker, in considering this subject I do not forget the fact, which is known to all who have had any experience in connection with institutions of this kind, homes for the blind and destitute as well as homes for the old soldiers, that the inmates of such institutions, having little or nothing to occupy their time, are very much given to complaining. In all such institutions experience shows that complaints are continually coming up; in fact, the inmates appear to hunt for causes of complaint. [Laughter.]

Nevertheless, we can not shut our eyes to the fact that the statements made upon this floor by the gentleman from Kansas and by other members would seem to indicate that there is something wrong in this Soldiers' Home. But assuming that to be so, the question is, who is to blame? I am willing to go just as far as the gentleman from Kansas will go in purging this Home of these wrongs if they exist, but I am not willing to vote, I can not and I will not vote, to strike down General Franklin unless I have some evidence of wrongdoing on his part such as would be required by a court or a jury. In other words, I am not willing to strike him down upon ex parte testimony. I do not know the men who make these affidavits. There appears to be no charge made here against General Franklin himself. He is not charged with immorality; he is not charged with dishonesty; he is not charged with brutality toward these men; he is not charged with mismanagement of this Home; he is not charged with drunkenness; he is not charged with being guilty of any of these wrongs.

Mr. CROWTHER. Does not the gentleman admit that in order to cure a disease it is necessary to strike at the root?

Mr. MAHON. I am coming to that. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who make these charges do not for one moment undertake to say that General Franklin has been guilty of these alleged wrongs. Now, suppose we remove General Franklin; that will not insure the correction of these evils, because his associates on the Board have the most implicit confidence in his judgment, and they will probably retain this same governor of the Home even if General Howard is put upon the Board of Managers. Mr. Speaker, there is but one fair and honorable way to settle this whole matter, and that is to have an investigation of this Home by Congress. This institution contains over 2,500 inmates, and they are entitled to have these evils corrected if they exist, but there is only one way to find out the facts. The charges made by the gentleman from Kansas may be true. Let us investigate and find out whether they are true or not. If General Franklin has been culpable in this business the fact can be ascertained. If the manager of that Home is guilty of drunkenness, or of brutality, or of mismanagement, that fact can be ascertained.

Mr. BLUE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir; although my time is limited.

Mr. BLUE. Is it not a fact that the amendment which you have offered proposes only to investigate A. J. Smith?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir; and I propose to state the reason for that. It is because you make all your charges against him.

Mr. BLUE. Not all.

Mr. MAHON. You charge that he is a drunkard; that he is guilty of brutality and mismanagement, and I want an investigation to ascertain the facts in the case. Mr. Speaker, this House can not afford to strike down General Franklin in this indirect manner. An investigation of this Home, of this man Smith, and of his conduct will develop and lay bare the whole business, and if General Franklin is found to be culpable, such an investigation will show it. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Kansas not to raise a point of order (as he can do) against this amendment, because by doing so he will defeat the very object that he is seeking to attain. This is a joint resolution, and I have no fear that the two gentlemen who will be appointed by the Speaker of this House and the one who will be appointed by the Vice-President of the United States to make the investigation will fail to do their duty. Both the Speaker and the Vice-President are disinterested in this matter, they probably have no special knowledge of this Home, and the men they will appoint will be of such a character that their investigation and report can be fully relied upon.

Now, I want to call attention to the amendment which I propose. If the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas proposing to strike out the name of General Franklin should be voted down, I propose to offer my amendment as an additional section, if no point of order be made against it. I will read the amendment:

SEC. 2. Whereas charges of drunkenness and brutality to inmates of the Home and mismanagement have been made against Col. Andrew J. Smith, governor of the Home at Leavenworth, Kans., the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House—

I have put the proposition in this form because this is a joint resolution, and we can not ignore the Senate—

shall appoint a commission of three persons, two of whom shall be members of the House and one a member of the Senate, to investigate said charges and file a report of their finding with the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers of the United States. If a majority of the commission find that said Col. Andrew J. Smith was guilty of said charges, or of either of them, the said Board of Managers shall forthwith remove him as governor of said Home—

It will be observed that this language is mandatory. We take all discretion out of the hands of the Board in this matter—and appoint some suitable person to fill said position. Five thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of said investigation. The commission shall have power to send for persons and papers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this amendment (if the gentleman from Kansas should not raise a point of order against it) will reach the very end that he is aiming at. If those who think as he does can prove that these charges against Colonel Smith are true, that officer will be removed as manager of the Home, which is what those gentlemen are seeking; and if the testimony should show that General Franklin has been in any way culpable in this business, of course in time he must fall with Colonel Smith.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Would the gentleman consent that this election to fill the place on that Board be postponed until the investigation he proposes be made, letting General Franklin take his chances of reelection after the result of the investigation has been made public?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir; that is the committee's business, not mine. I believe that the bill of the committee ought to go through with this amendment.

I want to say to the gentleman from Kansas that it is not within the power of the House to take this matter into its own hands. The resolution before us is a joint resolution, and the Senate must be consulted in this matter. If the gentleman does not take this fact into consideration he will fail of his purpose. I will not vote to strike down General Franklin or any other man on ex parte testimony. General Franklin, by long service, built up the record of a gallant soldier; he is now past the meridian and is approaching the end of his life. I do not propose, upon the ex parte testimony of inmates of this Home, to strike down this man and ruin his reputation forever. I want the facts ascertained in a proper way; and if the gentleman's charges should be proved true, then let us take appropriate action upon them. The gentleman from Kansas can not afford to object to my proposition. It opens the door for an investigation; it gives the gentleman the opportunity to establish every charge which he has made here. If the charges against Colonel Smith should prove to be true, he must of course go; and if he has been kept in position by General Franklin with a knowledge of the facts, General Franklin will have to go with him.

Mr. BLUE. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that the proposition he offers does not provide for investigating the conduct of General Franklin or the conduct of the Board. More than that, it makes the Senate a party to the investigation; and I caution every member here that any investigation in which the Senate takes part will be a "roaring farce." I propose to address myself to that point when my time comes.

Mr. MAHON. I will simply say that if the gentleman from Kansas expects to get this joint resolution through the House and the Senate according to his fashion he will stay here until he is a great deal grayer than he is now. This is a joint resolution—

Mr. BLUE. But there is a resolution before this body providing for an investigation by the House alone.

Mr. MAHON. How does the gentleman propose to pass it?

Mr. BLUE. I propose to get it through this House.

Mr. MAHON. Can the House alone instruct that Board what to do? We have no such authority.

Mr. BLUE. But this House can make the facts so plain that the sentiment of the country will reach the Senate. I propose to get at the bottom of this matter and show what the real facts are.

Mr. MAHON. Suppose you remove General Franklin from this Board; his associates do not believe him guilty of any such conduct as is charged here, and the removal of General Franklin does not insure the removal of Colonel Smith. The other members of the Board may decide to retain Colonel Smith, so that the gentleman fails in his purpose. I urge upon the gentleman from Kansas that if he really wants to befriend this institution and to get rid of this man whom he has held up as a monster in human form the adoption of my amendment is the proper method to do it, if the facts are as he states them.

Mr. HULL. I yield fifteen minutes, or such time as he may desire, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I feel a great deal of interest in everything pertaining to the Homes for these old soldiers, whether they be national or State, and I would give no vote nor would I utter a word to lessen the care and vigilance that the Government should exercise in the protection of these helpless men.

If I were to undertake to criticize the debate which has taken place on this question at all, I would say simply this, that these gentlemen ought not to criticize the old soldier very savagely because he wants occasionally to take a glass of beer. I have an idea that these gentlemen here, if, as many of them were, old soldiers without homes, as none of them are, without means of support, as none of them are, without friends, and were inmates of one of these Homes, no doubt each one of them would occasionally desire to take a glass of beer also. And I am not Pharisee enough to criticize them on that aspect of the case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not stand here to invite a controversy with the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], nor the fair-minded and just gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] who has just spoken with respect to this question. It is to be regretted, in the course of the procedure in this body, that there should have ever come a time or a condition when ex parte affidavits, scandalous in their character, should have a place on the permanent records of this country, assailing the great management of a great institution of the country and undermining the confidence of the public in its administration. I despise for my own part these ex parte assaults. I despise the scandal monger. I am not criticizing, of course, the gentleman from Kansas or any other gentleman on this floor. I do not want to get into a personal altercation or to arouse personal feeling in this debate, and there will not be anything of that kind so far as I am concerned. But when I sat and last listened, as I did on yesterday, to affidavits setting forth scandalous charges against a Government official, in which it was constantly asserted that he had perjured himself, I said to myself, a man's character seems to be nothing in this country when it can be blown away by the breath of anybody who is able to secure the services of a typewriter and commit to paper the vagaries of any scandalizing tendency of which he may be possessed.

It ought not to have been done. There ought to have been an investigation to establish the truth of the charges before they were spread upon the public records. There seems to have been ground for an investigation. There seems to be ground for the belief that Congress would be justified in deciding to investigate the matter and send a committee of the House for that purpose. I would not object even to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] himself being chairman of the committee appointed, with authority to investigate the condition of that one Home, or, indeed, of any other Home that has been assailed, and let us see through the investigation what the condition actually is. I do not believe the statements that have been presented to the House in connection with the matter. My training as a lawyer and my experience as a man teaches me that those stories are not as a rule to be relied upon. My observation of human character and my experience in life have taught me that there must be some mistake about this matter. There may be something, of course, in the charges, and doubtless there is something in them; but, as I have said and repeat, my experience has been against the truth of such statements—and my experience has been very considerable in connection with one of the Homes—that there is no truth in the matter.

I may be permitted to state that I was for a period of nine years and over a member of the board of managers at the Soldiers and Sailors' Orphans' Home in my own State of Ohio, and its president for five years. I was a member of the legislature of the State at another time, when a great mass of affidavits was brought in against the Democratic superintendent of this Soldiers and Sailors' Orphans' Home, and an attempt was made to force them upon the public records of the country—affidavits that made scandalous charges in every possible shape and with all due solemnity brought in under the guise of a protest against the action of the house of representatives, and an attempt was made, as I have said, to spread them on the journal pursuant to a provision in the constitution of the State of Ohio. As speaker of the house of representatives it became my duty to rule on their character, and I held that they were not, in any sense of the word, a protest, as they were alleged to be, and refused to permit their publication.

And, Mr. Speaker, after a full investigation of the facts it turned out that there was not a shadow of truth in any one of them. It was an attempt on the part of some discharged employees and some discontented tradesmen—and they are the greatest curse of public institutions where they are located—to smirch the administration of that Home, and that administration happening to be a Democratic administration and the house of representatives being Republican, it was thought that some capital could be made out of the matter, and yet when we came to the end of it there was nothing in it. And I take great pleasure in putting the name of the distinguished officer into this record who had charge of that Home. It was discovered that Dr. Kerr, of Granville, Ohio, the superintendent, was a model in every possible respect as an administrative officer. So I learned very much in that case of the value of ex parte affidavits. And so, while there may be a great deal in the facts submitted by the gentleman from Kansas, yet experience teaches us to be very careful how we give credence to such statements.

Mr. BLUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will yield, if it is only for a question.

Mr. BLUE. It will be a very short one.

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). For the tendency of the gentleman is so great in the way of expanding—

Mr. BLUE. Well, I do not know that my tendency in that direction exceeds that of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman desires to ask a question, and will proceed with it—

Mr. BLUE. Well, if you will stop I will ask the question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course, with my permission. You are camping on my ground now, and must not undertake to be too dignified. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLUE. Not at all. I only want to say—

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). I thought I would simply remind you of the existing condition.

Mr. BLUE. I understand that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is your question?

Mr. BLUE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio if it is not a fact that the Inspector-General's report, published in House Document 288, does not show, outside of any ex parte testimony to which he refers, the impropriety, to say the least of it, of the conduct of the officials of this institution?

Mr. GROSVENOR (reading)—

Governor A. J. Smith, to whose untiring energy and great resourcefulness much of the good work accomplished at this Branch is due, has remained in charge. His assistants seem to be officers of ability, and the general good condition indicates how much is done to benefit and improve the Home.

There is the answer, from the Inspector. That is from his report.

Mr. BLUE. That is the man who keeps the saloon and runs the jag cure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, well, now, the gentleman is so free with his scandal, he has got so impregnated with this stuff he read yesterday, that he can not even talk in parliamentary language. Now, let me go on. You will accomplish nothing but the exhaustion of my time.

Now, gentlemen, this is the condition. I am not saying that Mr. Smith ought not to be investigated. I do not say he ought not to be removed, but I do say that there is not here one single shadow of suspicion cast upon the character of General Franklin. I hold in my hand a telegram received by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] a few minutes ago from a very distinguished Republican of Connecticut, whom I happen to know personally very well. This telegram is as follows:

HARTFORD, CONN., April 16, 1896.

Hon. E. J. HILL:

General Franklin stands in this city for the most honorable and best citizenship. The community, irrespective of party, will appreciate every effort to refute the slanderous attack made upon his character as public official or private citizen.

MORGAN G. BULKLEY.

I may say that that telegram is signed by an ex-governor of Connecticut and a Republican. Now, this is the standing of this citizen of the United States to-day in the State of Connecticut. In war General Franklin was the peer of any man who drew sword in behalf of the establishment of the Constitution of the United States. I did not serve under his command, and I never saw General Franklin, so far as I remember, but I, in common with all the people of this country, have a knowledge of the splendor of his war record—that is, his record in war. Here is his record in peace. Can it be that General Franklin shuts his eyes to a violation of every obligation of duty? I will venture to say that when the truth comes out, if there has been any irregularity in that Home, General Franklin has protested against it and has been overruled by the majority of the Board; and I will undertake to say now that the vote of this House (and I am foreshadowing what is coming, the proof is coming)—if I am right about that, and if that be true, then your vote to destroy him to-day will be a vote to protect the repudiation of his request that Smith be removed and will be an indorsement of Smith and not a repudiation of Smith.

Gentlemen ought to get all the facts before they assail a great public officer. I am in favor of Franklin, therefore, because I am unwilling that a man of his distinguished character shall be stormed down here in the House of Representatives of the country for which he has done so much upon this sort of a case, made against an employee in one of these Homes.

Now, gentlemen, I have in Ohio a friend and an acquaintance whom I hold in high esteem. He was chief of artillery of the Army of the Cumberland, and to many a man here the mention of his name will suggest some familiar scene. I refer to Gen. James Barnett, of Cleveland, Ohio, a splendid citizen as he was a magnificent soldier. A man standing as high in the business circles of Ohio as any living man; a friend of the soldier; a member of the Loyal Legion; a member of the Grand Army of the Republic; a man who goes far and near to aid the soldier; president of the board that built the Thomas monument; member of all the associations in which the soldiers take an interest; a member of this Board of Governors of these Homes. He wrote me a letter several weeks ago. He said he understood there was going to be an attack made upon General Franklin. He said:

I want to say to you that he is the best member of that Board; the best member that has ever been on that Board since I was a member of it.

Then, knowing my proclivities to be a little partisan sometimes, he said:

In all my observation of him, in every act he has ever performed as a member of that Board, he has never said a word or done a thing by which I could have learned whether he was a Democrat or a Republican.

In these days that is not a bad recommendation for a man at the head of a great Board like that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said this much. I want to refer to the attack made by one Ezra B. Dean, whom I know perfectly well and know all about, upon the management of the Soldiers' Home at Dayton. There is no better place on earth for a soldier who has no home than the Soldiers' Home at Dayton. There is only one thing I ever criticised about it, and that did not come from within the Home, but from without the Home. I have more than once, standing right here, denounced a branch of the Pension Office here in this city for holding an annual meeting in the neighborhood of that Home for the purpose, as I believe, of influencing soldiers in the matter of the election. But, so far as the management of that Home is concerned, there is not a better managed institution on God's earth. And now let me tell you something: There was a General Patrick at the head of that Home, who was a soldier and a Democrat. He was an ex-soldier of the Regular Army.

Mr. BLUE. A brother-in-law of General Franklin, I believe. Mr. GROSVENOR. He gave offense to the Democrat managers in Ohio and they sought his removal; and they secured—as I am told and believe—the interposition of the President of the United States, who called upon General Franklin indirectly and urged the removal of that soldier. I do not think he is a brother-in-law of General Franklin. My friend from Kansas seems to be perfectly loaded with the pedigree of everybody connected with these Homes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HULL. How much more time does the gentleman desire? Mr. GROSVENOR. Two minutes more.

Mr. HULL. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BLUE. Is not he the brother-in-law of General Franklin, and related to two officers of the Soldiers' Home?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not care whether or not he is the brother-in-law; but I do know that he was the best man possible for that place, and I know that a personal appeal to the highest executive officer of this country did not swerve General Franklin from maintaining him in his position; and that is what I like General Franklin for, among other things. Why, you talk about General Howard! I have as much affection for good old General Howard as any man on earth. Will the gentleman go to the records of this House of Representatives and read them, if I will point them out, and I will show him there charges against Howard, made upon ex parte affidavits, made by an investigation compared to which all you have said about Franklin does not amount to a criticism. He was charged with fraud and speculation, charged with every species of outrage, and I never believed it. We have heard that General Howard was a good man, utterly unfit for all public duty except soldiering and lecturing. I never believed the assaults upon him.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. Was not General Howard a complete failure as superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want to answer; for I do not know.

Mr. BROMWELL. I do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He was not a failure when he was fighting our friends on the other side. [Great laughter.] He has been an officer of the Army until within six months, and I do not know that he has done any business except to lecture; but to put him against a man of the character of General Franklin as a business man I would not support General Howard. In the way of a kindness to General Howard I would cross the continent to do him a favor. Now, the very proposition itself will not do. It is not fair to destroy General Franklin by these ex parte attacks. This committee tell us—and I hope it will put it still plainer—that they have investigated this matter. There is no reason why General Franklin shall not be indorsed here by us. Let us approve the report of the committee; and then my friend from Kansas, let him come in with a two-edged sword, if he pleases, and I will support an investigation with him that will be an investigation. I have said this much not in partisanship, but without any feeling other than to do what I believe to be the right thing and the conscientious thing before God and man.

Mr. TAYLER. What about Ezra V. Dean?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I just want a word about Ezra V. Dean. That letter was read here stating he knew the condition of the Soldiers' Home at Dayton. I do not believe one word of that letter. He is a Democratic politician, living down on the Ohio River, who runs for Congress, and occasionally runs for other offices, but never gets any farther than the running [laughter]; who is always seeking in some way to ingratiate himself in the affections of a large section of the voters of that country and never successfully. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLUE. I yield fifteen minutes to my colleague [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the personal features of this controversy, I have nothing to say and I take no part in it. I have no acquaintance with General Franklin and have no knowledge of the facts except as stated on the floor or found in the record, but I do believe that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas to the resolution of the committee ought to prevail. I do not believe, however, with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], that should that resolution prevail there would be any "striking down" of General Franklin or anybody else. I do not understand that that amendment is an assault upon General Franklin or any other man. I have no part in any contest of that character. What are we about to do? About to engage in an election that occurs every six years for certain public officials. That is all. It so happens that after sixteen years of service the time comes when the House of Representatives shall determine whether General Franklin shall be reelected or whether somebody else shall be elected to a public office. Does a failure to elect General Franklin result as an assault upon him, as "striking him down," as treating him even with discourtesy? Certainly not. There are reasons enough, in my humble judgment, for his retirement without any action of that character.

I am told that when the proposed term of service will expire General Franklin will have reached the age of nearly 80 years, a period, I fear, when he will perhaps be unfit for the activities incident to that position. The gentleman from Connecticut told us yesterday how all of his time was occupied; that he was so engaged as to be connected with nearly all of the public interests of his State; that he was president of two or more of the great corporations; that he was the manager of another, and that he perhaps was transacting more business at this time, if the gentleman was not misinformed, than any other living man within the limits of the United States.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. HEPBURN. If I can, sir, I will.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Only a word.

Mr. HEPBURN. If it is only a word I yield.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The gentleman puts the matter altogether too strong. If he will refer to the RECORD he will find that I did say that General Franklin never yet had omitted to perform any private or official duty. I said explicitly that he never neglected a public duty because of private affairs.

Mr. HEPBURN. I made no charge. All I said is based on what the gentleman has said. I simply referred to what he did say. In addition to that—

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The RECORD will show all that.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman gave this House to understand that General Franklin was engaged in all—that was his phrase, if I am not mistaken—in all of the great enterprises of that very busy State, and that he had so conducted them, or some of them, that no man could get $200,000 insurance in the United States without appealing to the companies in the State of Connecticut or in the city of Hartford.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That is right. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, if General Franklin is so preoccupied it seems to me that it is our duty, at his advanced period in life, to relieve him of some of the unrequited burdens that for sixteen years we have been imposing upon him. [Laughter.]

But again, Mr. Speaker, I think, without any reflection upon any gentleman here, that this is an orderly and proper procedure. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] inveighs against "the ex parte affidavits" that are brought into this House, and descants upon the indecency, as he puts it, of introducing them here. In the name of all that is sacred, how is it possible to challenge the attention of the country to the wrongs which the gentleman from Kansas has portrayed without affidavits? Suppose the gentleman from Kansas had made his own statement here without these affidavits, it would have been like the ex parte commendations of the gentleman from Ohio. But the gentleman from Kansas came here with affidavits which were necessarily ex parte. There is no controversy in which witnesses could be examined and cross-examined. If evidence is to be introduced here at all, it must be in the nature of affidavits; and those affidavits must necessarily be ex parte.

Mr. RAY. Have you time to permit a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir; a question. Remember I limit you to a question. [A pause.] And I want it asked to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. I do not suppose you would want to hear an argument from me.

Mr. HEPBURN. No. They are always tiresome to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. They always floor you; that is the trouble. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; they always floor me. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. I want to ask you why it would not have been entirely practicable for the gentleman from Kansas to have preferred his charges against the governor of this Home, to have made them in writing, supported by his affidavits, directly to the Board of Managers in the first instance, and if they had refused to investigate the matter, or to listen to the charges, then to have brought the question to the Congress of the United States as a tribunal of last resort?

Mr. NORTHWAY. In the meantime the managers would have been elected for six years.

Mr. HEPBURN. I suppose the failure to pursue that course arose largely from the fact that the gentleman from Kansas is not an ass, and therefore would not make charges against the tribunal that was to try the charges. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit—

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I will not permit anything more.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one point in connection with the management of these Homes that I want to call attention to. I want the House to remember that these Homes are the physical expression of the gratitude of the people of the United States to the old soldier; that they are, in the broadest sense of the word, a charity, differing in that respect from the pension. The pension is a part of a contract. The law authorizing the pension goes hand in hand with the law calling for the volunteer. The pension is a part of the compensation. Not so with the Home. After the war was over, after the service had been rendered, then, as an act of charity, as an act of beneficence to the men who were homeless, without families and without support, this largess came from a grateful nation. It is a charity and nothing more. Yet see how certain men have turned it from its proper channel into a money-getting and a money-grubbing institution. In the report of the inspector I find this remarkable fact: In the Homes, all of them aggregated that are returned, I find that beer was sold during the last fiscal year that cost the sum of $96,977, on which there was a profit realized—the heading of the column is "Profit of beer halls"—on which there was a profit realized of $123,325.32, about 130 per cent upon the sales.

The gentleman from Ohio says that he is not one of those who are ready to be censorious when an old soldier takes a glass of beer. Ah, Mr. Speaker, none of us would be. But perhaps there are men connected with these institutions who, taking advantage of the appetite of the old soldier, would rob him in this way, through these extraordinary profits, of some part of the pension which his country gives him. Are these Soldiers' Homes to be continued to be used in this way? Again, if we are to continue the practice of establishing beer halls, let it be so, but do not try to make a profit out of the procedure. But, says some one, all of these profits are used for the benefit of the Home in the aggregate. That may be so, but here is one man who wants beer, and why should he be charged this extravagant price in order that the profit may go to the abstemious ones? The fact that the profits are used in the improvement of the Home and for the benefit of all alike—of those not contributing to the fund as well as of those who contribute—does not justify this extraordinary and outrageous tax. But that is not all. They turn it still further to profit. In this very Home—the Western—I read in the report of the inspector that from the 29th day of March, 1892, the date of the establishment of the Keeley institute there, to the end of the last fiscal year, a little over three years, 1,326 patients have been treated at a cost, some one told us yesterday, of $22.30 each. I am told that a royalty of $6 is paid to the inventor of this method of treatment, leaving a large profit on that end of the beer line of between $20,000 and $30,000. They catch them running this way, and they catch them running back. They foster the appetite; they create the drunkenness; they sell the beer at a profit, and then it is said they fill their coffers through compulsory processes brought to bear on the old soldier, compelling him to take the Keeley cure.

But they say that is not true, that there is no compulsion in regard to taking this cure, notwithstanding there are affidavits here that seem to substantiate the proposition. There is, however, this remarkable fact: There was last year an average attendance at that institution of about 2,200 persons in round numbers. The discharges during the period following the inauguration of the Keeley institute there was about 2,000, making a total of about 4,000 possible victims of this Keeley institute. One-third of that number have taken the Keeley cure. Gentlemen, do you believe that there was a necessity for that? Do you believe that there was that proportion of confirmed drunkards in that institution?

The inmates of the institution are gathered from the old soldiers of the country wide; they are the same class—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLUE. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HEPBURN. They are the same class, Mr. Speaker, as those old soldiers that live in your county and in mine. Is it true; will any man dare to make the assertion here, that one-third of the "old comrades" are sots or drunkards, are proper subjects for the Keeley cure?

Why, Mr. Speaker, the men of this class—the old soldiers—are at the head of all that is good in the society in which they move. They are members of the churches; they are in control of the schools. They are the respected men in business. They are not sots and drunkards. Yet this report, if the contention of gentlemen opposed to the proposition of my friend from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] is true, would seem to indicate that one-third of these men are sots and drunkards given up to habits of intoxication to such an extent that they are uncontrolled by will. I do not believe it. The very fact that this statement is made of this vast number that have passed through that institution indicates to my mind that something is wrong.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it must be remembered that we are making no assault upon any man. No man "goes down" in the offensive sense in which that phrase was used by the gentleman from Ohio. No criticism even is put upon General Franklin if the vote should be against his longer retention at the head of this institution. The committee has refused to recommend the reelection of two old comrades. Is this action dishonoring to them? Was it so intended? I would not dim in the slightest degree the luster, the renown that encircles his personality. A great soldier, a good citizen, a philanthropic man he may be. And yet this is a gratuity that he is rendering in all this service. He has given his time to it for sixteen years. He is now approaching that advanced age when he will need repose. I for one am willing to give it to him. I do not care that the blank should be filled with the name of General Howard. I am not at all solicitous as to who shall be General Franklin's successor. But I believe there ought not to be continued in place, without criticism, without a necessity for exemplification upon the part of the incumbent, any man for a long time. It is contrary to the genius of our institutions.

There is not a member of the House within the sound of my voice who is not more efficient as a Representative, trying to keep nearer to his people, more closely in touch with them, to know and obey more perfectly their will, from the fact that every two years we must appeal to the people for a renewed lease of power. The biennial elections make men here solicitous to consult the wishes of those whom they serve. Now, to keep these gentlemen in control of this institution year after year, term after term, without opportunity for investigation or scrutiny is unwise, undemocratic, contrary to the spirit and genius of our institutions; and when we can make a change without impugning in any way the character or the service of the gentleman whose term expires, I believe it to be only the part of wisdom to do so, thereby infusing new blood into this somewhat decaying institution. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to say anything in response to the remarks of a gentleman who always argues in the line of "when I open my mouth, let no dog bark." I dislike to say anything that may disturb the equanimity of my prohibition friend from Iowa. He always comes to the consideration of every subject with the vocal vigor and power of a Titan, and he dislikes to be interfered with, I know. He says he does not like to listen to anything I say because it always tires him.

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not say that.

Mr. RAY. I have noticed that a logical argument always exhausts the gentleman. I have admired the gentleman, and I admire him still—always shall; but I can not admire or approve the position he takes on this question; nor can I approve the course that has been taken in this House by those gentlemen who are in favor of dropping the name of General Franklin from this resolution and substituting that of General Howard. If it is a question of age, then I say that General Franklin is the equal of General Howard in mental and physical vigor to-day. There is no question about that. Both are patriotic, intelligent, honest, energetic, and capable men.

The gentleman from Iowa has said, "We make no assault on any man." Has no assault been made on any man in this discussion, when the gentleman from Kansas has stood up here and from his seat read ex parte affidavit after ex parte affidavit charging that General Smith has been "crawling, puling drunk" on many an occasion while governor of this institution? If this is not an attack upon a brave ex-soldier of the Union Army, then will the gentleman from Iowa tell me what does constitute a personal attack upon a man? And General Franklin is charged with the responsibility of keeping him in office with knowledge of his wrongdoings.

Mr. CROWTHER. If these charges are not true, why does it become necessary for the governor of that Home to take the Keeley cure?

Mr. RAY. I have not said that he may not have been drunk at some time. I would not undertake to deny the charge against any man in this House that he has been drunk at some time. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Do not look in this direction. [Laughter.] Mr. RAY. There are probably hosts of exceptions in the membership here. That I will admit. But I think sometimes perhaps it would be well for all of us to become inmates of some kind of a Keeley cure—one for the cure of mental excitement and intellectual intoxication, excessive zeal and aggressiveness; and I think the gentleman from Kansas and other gentlemen who have made these attacks on brave, true, and honorable men should have taken the Keeley cure or some kind of remedy for mental exuberance before making their charges.

Now, what I object to is the manner in which this subject has been treated. When I propounded the inquiry why the charges were not made in writing and submitted to the Board to be passed on first, I was met with the retort of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that the gentleman from Kansas is not an ass. [Laughter.] Now, I do not know whether he is an ass or not. [Laughter.] I do not care. He is not so regarded—presents no evidence on that subject. That is not the proposition here. I do not approve of an asinine performance, whether it comes from the distinguished gentleman from Kansas or any other man. I believe, Mr. Speaker, in according fair play and due trial to every citizen of this Republic. I never owned a dog that I would not give a fair trial before putting a bullet into his brain or branding him as a dishonest, disreputable dog. The gentlemen composing the Board of Managers of this Home are upright, honorable men. The gentleman, General Smith, who presides as governor over the institution is entitled to at least a fair hearing and a just trial, and is entitled to have the charges made and submitted to him, and he is equally entitled to be permitted to respond, present evidence, cross-examine witnesses, and not be tried and condemned on ex parte affidavits in the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] He has had no opportunity to be heard here. What do we know about the character, standing, or credibility of these witnesses? What do we know of the animus that actuates the persons making these affidavits? They are not made in a legal proceeding and no one of them can be indicted for perjury if he has sworn falsely. This looks like the assassination of character by a stab in the back. I can not approve it and am opposed to the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I think we have forty-seven minutes remaining, and the rest of the time belongs to the gentleman from Kansas. I hope he will consume the remainder of his time.

Mr. BLUE. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, how much time is left? The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROUT). The gentleman from Iowa has exhausted thirty-five minutes and the gentleman from Kansas fifty-nine, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. BLUE. I yield ten minutes of the time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. KIRKPATRICK].

Mr. HULL. I think the Speaker is mistaken as to the time. I will be glad, however, while the gentleman from Kansas occupies the floor, for the Chair to revise the statement, so that we may know exactly what time remains on each side.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly the necessity which compels us to bring this controversy on the floor of the House at this time. For years past, I may say, the people interested in this Home, and those residing in the vicinity of it, have tried every method known to them to oust this man Smith, the governor of the Home, from the control which he exercises there. Petitions have been filed, applications have been made to the Board of Managers, and their attention has been invited to his conduct and management time and time again, and yet each and every time an investigation or pretended investigation was made it only resulted in a whitewashing. It was hoped that the committee to which the matter was referred would investigate it and, if the facts suggested were made clear, that they would turn down, or leave out, if you please, from the management of these Homes in future the name of General Franklin.

It was not the desire of my friend from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] to make any attack on any gentleman, save and except with reference to the management of that Home, unless compelled to do so by the action of other parties. But, Mr. Speaker, we are here for the purpose of fighting this battle through to the bitter end; and as we have been compelled to come on the floor of the House to fight this controversy, we have resorted to the only method whereby we should bring the facts before the House and before the country.

I wish to call attention to the fact that not a single proposition made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] has been controverted or even disputed, unless by the mere bare statement of gentlemen on the other side of the controversy. No facts, no papers, no authentic testimony has been presented in contravention of his statements. We have offered you the affidavits of reputable gentlemen who seem to know the facts, which affidavits have had an influence upon a number of gentlemen here and to convince them that there is something wrong about the management of this Home at Leavenworth.

But, it has been suggested that we adopt another method; that we should again appeal to the same identical Board that whitewashed this man before and reelect this man for six years longer and then have an investigation to determine whether or not he should be permitted to remain. I submit this proposition in all fairness to the House: If you desire to deal justly and fairly with the matter, I will be content that the House shall consent to hold up the election in this case and give us the investigation suggested, and allow us to go to the bottom of the matter, and then take a vote after that report is submitted. That is all we ask.

Why should you elect a man that we charge to be responsible, by reason of his position, for all the wrongs which have been committed upon the old soldiers at that Home? Why elect him and then investigate some underling, who is employed by his consent and approval, who ought to have been removed years ago? Why, I repeat?

I know nothing of General Franklin. I have no charge to make against him; but he is the head of the Board of Managers, and things have been going on there which ought to have challenged the attention of any Board of Managers and have secured the removal of Smith years and years ago.

I do not rely upon the ex parte affidavits nor upon the mere statement of individuals. I say I can take the report of the Inspector-General himself and by that condemn the management of this Board; and that is a report about which there is no dispute.

Now, I am not here to discuss the Keeley cure, as to whether it is advisable or whether it is not; but if the management of this Home concludes that it is beneficial and desirable, then I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this treatment ought to have been administered to these old veterans at the actual cost of the treatment, and nothing more. If this treatment should be administered there, and if it is a good thing, then I say, why charge these old men $22.30 when the testimony shows that $6 was the price paid to Keeley? In other words, I say the report shows that these old men were held up in broad daylight and robbed of at least $10 each, taking the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] as to the price paid for the Keeley treatment. Our testimony shows that the price paid was $6 for each person, and a charge of $22.30 is made, and these old men are held up and bodily robbed of the difference between $6 and $22.30. If it is a good thing, if it is beneficial, then why not give them all the advantage of it at the very lowest possible cost? Lower the price and thereby induce them to take the treatment, if it is necessary and to their best interest to do so. Give them the lowest price possible and let them take the cure, if it is beneficial, and you will thereby induce more of them to take it. Why charge them $22.30, when you only pay out $6. In other words, the Government, which is paying these old men their pensions, is actually stepping in and paying that large difference, because it is taken out of the pensions of these men.

And another thing. From what little I have learned of the Keeley institute, I never supposed that a beer hall was a necessary adjunct to that institution. I never so understood it. I find on the very same page that we read the report of this Keeley cure a statement of the enormous profits from the beer hall in one year, amounting to $13,800. In one end of the hall, if you please, they are dishing out beer, and the profits are $13,800, and in the other end of the hall they are injecting this gold treatment into the patients. It simply takes them going and coming, and I apprehend from what I can learn from the sales of beer at these institutions that they are making more men drunk there than they are curing of the drink habit. If it is deemed necessary to have beer for these old veterans kept on the grounds of the Home, and that is the best method to be employed, I will not complain, nor will I criticize one of these old fellows if he desires to take a glass of beer, but I will criticize the management that charges him a double price for it in order to pile up a profit of $13,800 in a single year. If it is desirable to furnish beer, let it be furnished at the actual cost to these men. Why not charge them double the price of the provisions they eat in that institution, or the clothing they wear, or any other necessities furnished them? Why not double the price upon them and rob them of their pensions in that way? I say that this record alone demonstrates there is something wrong in this management, even if you discard all of the affidavits. But no man can live within a radius of 250 miles of that institution without being impressed, without absolutely knowing, that there is something wrong and crooked in the management of this institution.

And I want to say further to you that Governor Anthony in his statement struck the keynote when he said that there was something that bound Governor Smith and Dr. Franklin together that was inexplicable. He told the truth; and had it not been for the resistance of Dr. Franklin this man Smith would have left that institution long ago, as our people believe.

Now, what we ask of this House is to stand by us and place another man there, we care not whom. We have no man whom we are urging for that position. I care not with whom you fill the place, provided he is a good man. We have not come here in the interest of any candidate, but we come here fighting for this institution. It is suggested by some gentlemen on the floor that we must yield in this controversy because the Senate will not agree to it. Well, if gentlemen will assert their rights upon this floor it will be a long time before there is an election reached in this matter. Why should we yield our consent to the reelection of this same man that could have saved us all this trouble on the floor of this House? Hold up the election, if you desire, for ninety days, or until the short session, say in December. Give us a committee. Give them the power and authority to investigate, and let them report, and then vote to elect General Franklin or not after you have heard all the facts as stated where the testimony is not ex parte. We court the investigation. What do you propose to do? Do you propose to deny the appeal of these old soldiers, of whom there are 60,000 in our State? I have much more I would like to say on this subject, but the time allotted me has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I should like three minutes more.

Mr. BLUE. Before that can be done, I will say that according to the record kept I have only ten minutes left. I will ask, Mr. Speaker, that the time be extended thirty minutes longer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote is to be taken at 3 o'clock, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. BLUE. Then it can only be done by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent would have to be given that the vote be taken at a later time.

Mr. BLUE. Then I ask that the vote be taken at 3.30 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the vote be taken at 3.30 o'clock, the time to be equally divided, as the Chair understands it. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. I think there has been enough of this.

Mr. HARDY. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

The gentleman from Iowa has forty-four minutes remaining.

Mr. HULL. How much time has the gentleman from Kansas?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He has ten minutes.

Mr. HULL. That makes more time than we have. However, we are losing time. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] ten minutes, and ask him to yield back such time as he may not use.

Mr. HARDY. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I find that in passing upon this joint resolution I am called upon to pass judgment on four men or four sets of men. First, upon the Committee on Military Affairs, which I understand has reported this joint resolution; secondly, upon the Board of fifteen managers of the Home for Disabled Volunteers, composed of such men as General SEWELL, of New Jersey, a distinguished Senator, a man of exalted character and undoubted patriotism and love for his comrades; composed of such men as Major STEELE, who perhaps did more fighting for his country in the regular and volunteer forces than any man in this body. I know him, by his long record, to be one of the most devoted friends of his comrades. We have to pass judgment upon General Franklin, and we have to pass judgment on General Smith. The great poet has warned us to be careful when we touch a man's good name; and the good names of Franklin and Smith are dearer to them than the stars that they won on the field of glory.

I am asked to vote against the committee and its judgment, the Board of Managers so carefully chosen, and against Franklin and Smith. On what evidence? Has any gentleman presented himself at the door of the Committee on Military Affairs and asked a hearing on those charges? Not one. Have charges been filed before this great committee of the House and an investigation demanded? There have not. But now, when this resolution comes before this body, ex parte affidavits are fired broadcast over the country, making assaults directly upon two of the four, and indirectly upon the four. I for one demand fair play for these four representative bodies and distinguished men. I would not want to be tried and convicted and my name blackened to the coming generations of this country on such a showing. Is it true that the lawyers of this House, familiar with the rules of evidence on which men should be tried for life, liberty, and property, and their standing among the community, can acquiesce in this assault?

But there are other things that appeal to my mind that will compel me to vote in favor of the report of this committee. I understand that Governor Morrill, of Kansas, whose interest in the good opinion of that State as its chief executive ought not to be second to the interest of any member of this House from that

State, in close touch with his people, ambitious, as he should be, to retain their confidence and approval in the future, one who served for years as a member of this body, noted and distinguished for his absolute fairness to his own side as well as those opposed to him in political views, a man who has served upon that Board as a member, knows all the weaknesses and strength of the complainants, which must be found in all these Homes more or less—Governor Morrill has sent us word that he approves of the course of General Franklin and the course of General Smith. I want to tell you that no ex parte affidavits will make me put the seal of condemnation on a committee of this House, this Board of distinguished men, and Franklin and Smith, crowned with the glory of great lives, with Governor Morrill giving me such counsel.

I will not discuss General Howard. He is not concerned. He is my respected and loved friend, and commanded the army of which I was an humble member. But no Howard's or Henderson's name shall be held up before me to blacken the name of any comrade or a body of comrades except on charges made, fairly filed and tried, and a verdict rendered. [Applause.] With a clear mind and an untrammelled judgment I shall vote for the joint resolution. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HULL. How much time has the gentleman left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There were three minutes of the time unused.

Mr. BLUE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CALDERHEAD].

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Speaker, two minutes is a very brief time to say anything in reply to the eloquent gentleman who has just taken his seat. But if I can have his attention during that time I think I will remind him that the first guardian of every man's good name is himself; the first guardian of every man's reputation is himself. There is no need of questioning those who have brought the testimony in this case before this House about the management of this Branch Home, relying solely upon ex parte evidence. The affidavits were not made for the purpose of destroying the reputation of General Franklin or injuring the character of Colonel Smith. They were made for the purpose of describing the facts that transpired. How else would you get testimony concerning them for the purpose of presenting them here? That they might have been presented to the Committee on Military Affairs in some other form is true. Why they were not I do not know; but it is also true that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] had a perfect right to present the facts to this House when members were asked to vote for the reinstatement of the president of this Board of Managers. Let me give the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] a little more than ex parte testimony. This Home was established in 1885. In 1886 these charges were made against Colonel Smith. In 1892 there was an investigation, and it was then publicly spread over the entire State that Colonel Smith was protected in his position in that investigation by General Franklin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes, not to come out of the time of either side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless the time is yielded the gentleman's time can not be extended.

Mr. HOPKINS. By unanimous consent it can.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not unless the time for taking the vote is extended.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, I coupled with my request for the extension of the gentleman's time the suggestion that the five minutes be not taken out of the time on either side, and that the vote be taken at five minutes after 3 instead of at 3 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object. There is plenty of time on that side; let them yield it to him.

Mr. BLUE. I have not got it to yield.

Mr. CANNON. I am not going to take any part in this discussion myself, but five minutes' time is not so valuable, and as this is a matter which concerns the gentleman's State, I think his time ought to be extended.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] has no time to yield, then I do not object to the extension, but if the time is to be extended on one side it ought to be extended on the other. Let the time for taking the vote be extended for ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken at half past 3 o'clock, the additional half hour to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Several members objected.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the time occupied in this discussion comes out of my time or not. If it does I have hardly any left.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair knows no fairer way than to take it out of the time on both sides.

Mr. BLUE. I yield the gentleman from Kansas one minute.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I do not want to abuse the patience of the House, but I will remind gentlemen that charges were investigated there first in 1892, and it was then made known to all of us that the commander of this Home was protected in his place in that investigation by direction of General Franklin. The next investigation was made in 1893, and after it was over it was published broadcast in newspapers in our State that the manager of the Home had again been protected because he had been appointed and was maintained in his position by General Franklin. The next investigation took place in 1894, and again it was published in every paper that was in favor of disclosing the actual condition of things there that he had again been protected. It was distinctly published that the investigation in December, 1894, by General Averill, was conducted with secrecy and that every effort was made to prevent a public exhibition of the truth. These facts testify that General Franklin should not be reelected until there is a fair investigation there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLUE. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has four minutes and a half left.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. SPERRY.

Mr. SPERRY. I simply rise for the purpose of saying that which in justice I ought to say. I have known General Franklin for over thirty years. I knew him when he was in the field. I knew him as an official of the State of Connecticut, the adjutant-general of our militia, and I have never heard one breath of suspicion directed against his character; and, gentlemen, I want to say to you that if you are going to take a contract to make out that General Franklin is a dishonest man or that his character is not of high standing among men, you will require millions of dollars to carry out such a contract in the State of Connecticut.

General Franklin's name for integrity and honor and uprightness is as high as that of any man that lives in our State. He does not belong to the same party that I belong to, but I feel that I should be doing injustice to myself and the State I in part represent, did I not add my testimony to that of others in relation to the good name and character of General Franklin. I am glad to do full justice to him, and I say to you, gentlemen, do not attempt to tear down the character or the fair name of General Franklin. You can not afford to do it. You ought not to attempt to do it. His standing and his character are as bright in our State as the noonday sun, and I fully indorse everything that my colleague [Mr. HENRY] said about him yesterday. I indorse the telegram that was sent to this House by ex-Governor Bulkeley; and, Mr. Speaker, before I take my seat I wish to say that when my colleague [Mr. RUSSELL] left here yesterday he said that he desired me to indorse General Franklin fully for him and in his behalf. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. BLUE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1466) to purchase, inclose, improve the sites or portions thereof of certain forts, battlefields, and graves of American soldiers, sailors, and marines in the Maumee Valley, and to erect thereon appropriate monuments and commemorative tablets;

A bill (S. 2022) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska";

A bill (S. 1537) to provide for the private sale of public lands in Missouri; and

A bill (S. 682) for the relief of the heirs of Sterling T. Austin, deceased.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 2224) granting an increase of pension to Lewis C. Schilling; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 85) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 2813) granting a pension to Rita Stine.

BOARD OF MANAGERS OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Indiana desires to send to the desk—

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, was permission given to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asked for objection and there was none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understood the Chair, just as he was about to submit that question, to call attention to the arrival of a message from the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not ask the consent in as full a voice as was perhaps necessary. The Chair will again submit the request.

Mr. GROSVENOR. All I want to say is this: I have no objection to the gentleman from Kansas extending his own remarks; but I will protest now and always against interpolating in the RECORD under the guise of an extension or leave to print affidavits or letters assailing individuals.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman wish the question put again?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do, most decidedly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Kansas to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. Was not that consent given?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understood.

Mr. HEPBURN. The Chair so announced, as I understood the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did so announce.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then I object to the opening up of the matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Chair did not so announce. I was listening carefully, and no such consent was given.

Mr. HEPBURN. I object to the gentleman being permitted to override the Chair and the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not expect to do either; but I merely ask that the facts be stated as they occurred.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair said that without objection it would be so ordered; and no objection was made, as the Chair heard. But let the Chair state that the Chair did not announce the question in a very full voice—

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, we heard it; and it was so understood.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not hear it. I only want to protest against the insertion of the affidavits—

Mr. BLUE. Well, protest if you want to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So I shall protest; and will make my protest to the Public Printer.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], who wishes to send to the desk certain telegraphic dispatches received by him this morning, to be read.

Mr. STEELE. These dispatches, Mr. Speaker, at least the first one of them, is a response to a request made on yesterday. I do not want to take up the time of the House any longer than necessary, but as these have a direct bearing upon the question at issue I ask that they be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 15, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

At the earnest solicitation of Gen. J. A. Forsythe, regular soldiers were admitted for treatment for alcoholism for four weeks each up to April, 1894, to the number of 94, when General Franklin ordered its discontinuance. In not a single instance was a veteran denied admittance in consequence. This charge was investigated by General Averill and Colonel Cooke, and proved untrue.

ANDREW J. SMITH, Governor.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 15, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

The charge of drunkenness against Col. Andrew J. Smith is absolutely false. I see him daily, and know him to be a generous, kind-hearted man, anxious for the welfare of the veterans.

W. J. GILLESPIE,
Protestant Chaplain, Soldiers' Home.

KANSAS CITY, KANS., April 16, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE, M. C.:

THOS. KINELA,
Catholic Chaplain, Soldiers' Home.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 15, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE,

J. L. FRYER,
Assistant Surgeon, Soldiers' Home.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 15, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In the name of Veterans' Keeley League, we brand as a lie the charge of drunkenness against Governor A. J. Smith. We see him daily and know how false it is. He is the most honored member. We owe all we are to-day to him.

JOHN T. PEET, President.

Following for your information:

"Governor A. J. SMITH:

"The dispatch sent from this city to Congressman BLUE purporting to be signed by myself and Mahoney and Albott is a forgery. Neither myself or the others authorized the sending of such dispatch. We have no fight against Governor Smith, and denounce the attempt to cause his removal. Affidavit made by an old soldier named McGraw that we signed said dispatch is absolutely false.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 15, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I have been surgeon of the Western Branch since October, 1893, and have never known Governor Smith to be drunk or even take a drop of stimulants. As to his forcing men to take the Keeley cure, it is absolutely false. His treatment of the men is kind and humane.

D. C. JONES, M. D.,
Surgeon Western Branch.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 15, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In behalf of the National Keeley League, numbering 35,000 men, I denounce the charge of drunkenness against Governor Smith as a vile slander. He is serving his third term as our national president. We know how absolutely false that charge is.

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 15, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE,

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., April 15, 1896.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I certify on honor that no veteran was ever denied admission to this Home because of Regular Army men admitted to take the Keeley cure. If it were so I would know it on account of my position.

ROBERT HAYES,
First Lieutenant and Assistant Adjutant Soldiers' Home.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs in reporting this resolution were unable to foresee its course upon the floor of the House, and certainly did not expect to precipitate a fight on the lines that have been drawn. And I may be permitted to say, sir, in this connection, that it does not seem to me that this is a proper place to make such a fight as has been inaugurated by the gentleman from Kansas.

I have a profound respect for my distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. BLUE]; but with all deference to him, it does seem to me that if he wanted to make these charges and have a fair and honest investigation of them, at the very beginning of this session of Congress he should have introduced a resolution calling attention to the charges and asking for an investigation of the matter. He should have had a committee appointed by this House, composed in such way as to insure a fair, impartial, and honest investigation of the allegations which have been made with reference to this Home at Leavenworth. This would have given the Committee on Military Affairs and the House reliable information upon which to base action.

I do not believe it is right for any member on the floor of the House to challenge the character of a man and introduce ex parte statements, as the character of General Franklin and Gen. A. J. Smith have been challenged in the last twenty-four hours, without any chance on their part to make a response. It has been done under the guise of a warm love for the old soldiers of our country.

Mr. Speaker, no man can surpass me in my devotion to the cause of my comrades in arms, whether they be in the Homes or out of them. I stand now, as I have always stood, for everything which benefits them. But here is an attack on a man who during the dark days of the war, when the country needed the services of good men, was a gallant, brave, and efficient officer, as efficient and gallant as the Federal Government had in its service, who has been assailed with marvelous bitterness. I refer now to Gen. A. J. Smith. I did not expect to participate in this debate, but I can not remain silent. This old soldier shall not be utterly condemned and disgraced without my raising my voice in favor of a plea for calm judgment and decent treatment. He is a man whose comrades have spoken of him on this floor with the highest respect, who fought under the same flag and slept under the same blanket, and, as one expressed it, "drank from the same canteen." This gentleman, who knew him well, certified to his good character during the war. Shall it not count something for a man that for four years he followed the flag of his country on bloody battlefields and risked his life in defense of the Union? He has served his country in different positions since the war with credit to himself, and among the positions he has held has been that of superintendent of the Soldiers' Home for years at Leavenworth.

Unquestionably at one period of his life, and I do not wish to palliate anything with reference to the matter, he was guilty of taking too much spirituous liquors for his health; he became frequently intoxicated. I admit that he drank to excess. None of his friends will deny it. I have known a great many old soldiers who got into the same bad habit. But this man finally reformed and took the Keeley cure. Is that a disgrace to him? I honor him for his desire to again become a good citizen, and am glad that the avenues were opened up to him by which he and thousands of others, both old soldiers and men who never followed the flag of the country on the field of battle, can become free from that vice which destroys manhood and self-respect. From the day he took the Keeley cure to this time, I do not believe that there is a particle of evidence which would be admitted in any court of competent jurisdiction in this country to establish the fact that he has ever touched a single drop of intoxicating liquor.

We are none of us so immaculate that we should gather our garments about us and refuse justice to a man who has gone down into the depths of horror of the alcohol habit and then struggled back to the solid ground of sobriety. It is awful for a man to fall; it is glorious for a man to surmount habit and overcome weakness. Is it not an awful responsibility for a man to put in our records—the records of our country—the charge that this brave and distinguished soldier, A. J. Smith, is a brutal drunkard? In the name of fairness and justice I protest. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is to my mind a wrong upon any man to put upon the records of Congress, to be preserved for all time, the scurrilous, scandalous, and villainous charges that have been preferred against this man by purely ex parte statements from men who have a grievance.

This is not the place to try A. J. Smith. If he were all they charge him with being, he is entitled to a trial before some tribunal that can sift the evidence, and whose verdict will have some weight with the sober-minded, thinking people of the United States. We are here to elect a Board of Managers for the Soldiers' Homes, not to try charges against creatures of this Board. We are here to elect men whose duty it is to administer the affairs of these Homes, and they are and should be responsible for the selection of the different officers of the Homes. Congress is not the place to make an investigation. We have no time or opportunity to take evidence. I do not object to holding all officers to a strict responsibility, but I want to say to you, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, that this whole fight is based upon the idea of getting rid of A. J. Smith. Is not that true? Has there been a word said in debate, a word during all this bitter discussion that we have had, that does not show that the entire animus of the attack on General Franklin is to get rid of Governor Smith?

Now, if that is true will that be accomplished by defeating General Franklin's reelection? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] spoke about the necessity of a change, and said that this was the proper place to bring these charges. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] in asking him a question wanted to know why charges had not been preferred before the Board and a trial had. My good colleague from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] seemed to think it would be an asinine performance to prefer charges before that Board. Let me say to him that charges were preferred before that Board. They have had this matter partially adjudicated. The first trial was some years ago. The last trial was December 14, 1894.

Mr. STEELE. 1895.

Mr. HULL. 1894.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HULL. If it is only for a question, I will.

Mr. HEPBURN. Have charges ever been preferred against General Franklin?

Mr. HULL. Oh, no; only against Mr. Smith.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] asked me why charges had not been preferred against General Franklin.

Mr. HULL. I did not understand that. I understood him to mean charges against Smith. If the gentleman's statement is correct, then I misunderstood the question.

Mr. RAY. "The gentleman from New York" did not mean to be understood as the gentleman seems to have understood him.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is what the gentleman said. I was talking about Franklin.

Mr. HULL. General Franklin ordered an investigation of the charges against the management of the Leavenworth Home. General Pearson, the representative of the Board from Pennsylvania, was directed to conduct it. General Franklin did not personally appear. I am not acquainted with General Pearson, but the Representatives from Pennsylvania tell me that he is a man of high character, of absolutely unimpeachable integrity, a man of profound love for his old comrades, a man who would not do an injustice to anyone, and who, if he was charged with a duty, would thoroughly and honestly discharge it. What was his finding? This was not an ex parte investigation. It was an investigation in which every man who had charges to prefer made them. All had an opportunity to have all complaints fully investigated. Fifty citizens of Leavenworth, leading men, wanted to be heard in defense of the Home and of Colonel Smith. They could only hear ten of them. The matter was all investigated. This ex parte testimony was all sifted to the bottom, and the result of the finding was the vindication of the management of the Home and of General Smith. These very men who are coming here with their charges went there, and from what I can learn the larger part of these charges that have been reiterated on this floor were made there and thoroughly disproven.

Mr. STEELE. Governor Morrill was with General Pearson.

Mr. HULL. Governor Morrill, who was once a member of this House, and who is now governor of Kansas, was there.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Governor Morrill was not present.

Mr. STEELE. He was there.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. No; Governor Morrill was not present.

Mr. HULL. Governor Morrill was until 1894 a member of the Board and local manager of this Home. Now, I want to call your attention to another fact. These gentlemen want to get rid of Franklin, because they say he is responsible for keeping Smith in his place. After these investigations General Franklin believed that Smith's usefulness was largely impaired, because of the fact that the fight which was inaugurated by Senator Plumb, who was, I suppose, as great a fighter as ever lived in Kansas, a great and good man, but an intense partisan, was carried on with such intense bitterness. Plumb started out to crush the management of the Home, and if he had not been called hence he would have been fighting on that line yet. General Franklin believed that Smith's usefulness had been impaired, and when the question of sustaining him had been brought up, General Franklin, General SEWELL, and John C. Black, of Illinois, voted to remove Smith. I want the House to note this fact. Franklin voted as the gentleman from Kansas now desires. I have the testimony of Senator MITCHELL of Wisconsin for this. He is a member of the Board and authorizes me to make this statement on the floor. General Franklin voted to remove him, Colonel Smith. General Pearson, who conducted the investigation, said that he would not consent to such a gross injustice being done as to allow charges disproved to destroy any man, and the rest of the Board voted to retain him.

Mr. STEELE. Until an investigation should be had.

Mr. HULL. Until a full investigation should be had, and under a full investigation General Pearson insists that Smith will be vindicated at every point.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When was that?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Indiana says that the investigation was made in 1893. My recollection is that it was in December, 1894.

Mr. STEELE. General Pearson and General Morrill made an investigation in 1894, when these affidavits were presented, and General Averill and Colonel Cooke made an investigation in 1895 of the same charges.

Mr. HULL. Many of us know Senator MITCHELL, and I want to say that when he gives me his word of honor that such a state of facts as that exists, I will take it. I have no doubt the records of the Board will prove that he has told the simple truth in regard to this matter. I have no objection, and the Committee on Military Affairs have had no objection, to making an investigation. We delayed action on this resolution until the very last moment, until the time when the terms of these officers were about to expire, and from the evidence submitted to us by every member of the Board and by an examination held under the authority of the Board, where a fair trial could be had, in spite of what has been said about the inability of that distinguished Board to control these Homes, on their evidence we reported the names we have.

Another thing, gentlemen. You talk about getting in new blood. We have set aside two old members and put in two new ones. We have injected new blood; and if succeeding Congresses will do the same thing, in a little while you will have entirely a new Board of Managers. But I do not believe the Committee on Military Affairs or this House should fail to reelect General Franklin, in view of what has been telegraphed over the United States; and if you defeat him you place upon him the brand of dishonor, no matter what may be said. I admire General Howard; but there was a period in my life when I believed General Howard was not only grossly incompetent, but grossly dishonest; and it required time and investigation into his methods while in charge of the Freedman's Bureau to convince the people of the United States that his character was as pure as that of any man in the United States. If he had been tried on the ex parte testimony that went through the United States at the time the Freedman's Bureau collapsed, the people of the United States would have said that Gen. O. O. Howard was not only incompetent, but that he was dishonest.

I want to refer briefly to one or two other points. They have talked about this Inspector of the War Department report. I want to call attention to it. This was not in favor of General Smith or any other man. This is the report of the Inspector of the War Department; and I want to call attention to the question of discipline at these different institutions. Take the Central Home. That, you gentlemen all say, is well managed, in spite of the letters that reflected so upon it. This report from the War Department says:

There has been an improvement in the discipline of the men, and the per cent of the whole number cared for that were not tried during the year has increased from 71 to 77 per cent.

That is the Dayton Home. The total number of members was 4,985, and 77 per cent were not tried for breaches of discipline. I will not read the rest. The Marion Home had 77 per cent not tried for breach of discipline. I will not take up all the others, but call attention to the Home under discussion. Taking the number tried during the year for infractions against the rules and regulations as a criterion of discipline, the discipline appears to be more favorable than that of any of the Homes.

Number of members cared for, 3,658; 94.61 per cent were not tried for breach of discipline.

In other words, the discipline at Leavenworth is better than that of any of the Homes that have been inspected by the War Department. Now, what does this same Inspector say about General Smith? He is the one that is on trial. He says:

Governor A. J. Smith, to whose untiring energy and great resourcefulness much of the good work that has been accomplished is due, has remained in charge.

He goes through the whole list of the Homes, and when he comes to this Home, this War Department Inspector, free from all control of this Board of Managers, gives to this Home a meed of the very highest praise for its management and the method of business involved in its conduct.

Now, I do not know that it is any business of mine to refer to one question that has been dwelt on here at such great length, that of the beer saloons and the Keeley cure. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, if I had the power I would take beyond the pale of every reservation all intoxicating liquors for sale as a beverage; but you have got to face this one fact, that in each and every Home you have a large number of inmates who will indulge in these intoxicating beverages whether they buy them at the Home or have to walk a mile or 2 miles to get them. You have got this fact. At Marion they have no Home saloon. The inmates are turned loose upon the people, outside of the jurisdiction of the United States, to be preyed upon and robbed. At least the pickpockets are not admitted to those Homes. Every one of you gentlemen who lives in a town where soldiers that are not in the Homes are paid off—

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman yield to me? I want to strengthen his statement by reference to the Home in California.

Mr. HULL. I have not time.

Every man who lives in a town of that kind knows that in the case of men who have enough to live outside you can not take up your daily paper after a pension payment has been made that you do not read where a dozen of the pensioners have got drunk and had their pockets picked—that what they do not spend for beer the pickpockets get. At least these beer halls in the Homes keep the boys from having their pockets picked. It may be true that these men are old enough now not to drink, but we have got to take them as they are, and there is not an old soldier on this floor who has met his comrades in their grand encampments who does not know that they will drink every time they want to, and they do not think it is anybody's business, either.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I need say anything more on this point. If you do not let the old soldiers spend their money in the Home they will go outside. If they spend it in the Home the profits are not used for the benefit of individuals, as would seem to be implied in some of the speeches here; the profits are used for the benefit of the soldiers themselves, and, for my part, I would rather, if this traffic is to exist, that the old soldier should get the benefit of the profit than that it should go to private saloon keepers. And, further, I will assert that these canteens reduce the total of intoxication. As to the Keeley cure, I certainly do not object to that if it tends to wean these men from their vicious habits. What does the War Department say of the Keeley cure? That report is not made under the duress of Colonel Smith or under the duress of the Board of Managers. It is a report made by a man who is absolutely independent of Colonel Smith and also of the Board of Managers, an Inspector of the War Department. That report says that 189 persons were treated for alcoholism and the morphine habit during last year, and adding that to all that were treated before, gives a total of a little over 1,900. But the point in connection with this subject that I want to call attention to is that in that period the lapses have been only 11 per cent. You see, then, gentlemen of the House, that this Keeley cure, which has been so denounced here, has saved 89 per cent of those who have taken the treatment, and for one I say God speed the Keeley cure if it rescues my old comrades from this degrading vice.

I have but a minute or two more, and in that time I want to say that I cherish the honor of the old soldiers as much as any man on this floor can possibly cherish it, but at the same time I say that those old soldiers, grouped together there in the Home, men without home ties, men who have no abiding place, can find fault with almost anything, and many of them would not be happy if they did not find fault. Let us, in our action here to-day, so vote that we shall not cast a slur upon any man who served his country in the hour of its peril, but, if necessary, let us give an honest, fair, and impartial trial, which will enable the people of the great Republic to do justice to all the interests concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to ask my colleague a question. Your committee has omitted to recommend the reelection of two members of this Board of Managers. Do you regard that as an assault upon those men or as a reflection upon their moral standing?

Mr. HULL. I will answer that. One member of the Board, Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, desired to be retired and we selected another gentleman from the State of Maine to succeed him. The custom of Congress has been that the majority party here has controlled the majority of the Board, and we thought that Gen. John C. Black might properly retire and give place to that other gallant old soldier from Illinois, Gen. Thomas J. Henderson, and we made that recommendation. There was no charge against either of the gentlemen retired, and both have acquiesced in the change. I submit the following telegram:

HARTFORD, CONN., April 16, 1896.

Hon. E. J. HILL.

House of Representatives, Washington:

Hon. Henry C. Robinson says Gen. W. B. Franklin is a man of incorruptible integrity and thorough patriotism. J. M. Allen, president of the Board of Trade, says, "It gives me great pleasure to say that I have known Gen. William B. Franklin for many years and can not speak too highly of his sterling integrity and unswerving devotion to what he regards as just and right. My intimate acquaintance with him has led me to hold him in highest esteem." Charles P. Graham, adjutant-general of the State, speaks in the strongest and most unqualified terms in favor of General Franklin. Governor Bulkeley concurs decidedly in these opinions and has already wired you direct. These expressions are, as you must know, entitled to great weight. For myself, I desire to add that for many years I have entertained very high regards for the great services, high character, and unquestionable ability of General Franklin. Any number of strong testimonials could be easily obtained if needed and a little time could be had for the purpose.

O. VINCENT COFFIN,
Governor of Connecticut.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. A telegram has been read here from Leavenworth, charging me with having had read in this body a forged telegram. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] has presented that telegram. I denounce the statement as cruelly and maliciously false, and the presentation of that telegram as cowardly and uncalled for. I hold in my hand the original telegram sent to me. It was not used on the floor of this House, and that telegram denouncing it as a forged telegram and the statement as a lie was brought in here for the purpose of having its influence on this floor. I have here the original telegram as sent to me, with a statement that was published in the Leavenworth Times and in the Leavenworth Standard, which is friendly to Mr. Smith, with an accompanying affidavit. I ask, in justification to myself, that the telegram as originally sent to me and the statements in the affidavit be read.

Mr. HULL. Before granting consent, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I also will ask that the telegram which I hold in my hand may be read.

Mr. BLUE. Excuse me, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. HULL. Well, it is easy to take you off.

Mr. BLUE. I had not read the telegram referred to, and did not propose to read it, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] must have known that, because he asked me last night if I had that telegram, and I said that I had and that if he wanted to read it I was ready to support it with statements.

Mr. STEELE. What I said to the gentleman was, "Have you read such a dispatch?" and he said, "Yes, and I have affidavits to verify it." That is how I understood him. Now, if I was mistaken in that, I certainly am willing to withdraw the dispatch I had read here and ask members to pay no attention to it.

Mr. BLUE. I said that I had not used the dispatch and did not propose to use it. I have also here a letter—I can not give the name of the writer without a betrayal of confidence—saying that that statement in that telegram was true, and that a Catholic priest was used to get a retraction in the interest of Mr. Smith.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLUE. I have also, upon this question, another communication showing the methods practiced—

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to the gentleman going any further than his statement in connection with that telegram.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I also must object, Mr. Speaker. This is practically a debate on the merits—

Mr. BLUE. No, sir; it is on a question of privilege with reference to these papers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that as he did not read the telegram referred to his statement covers the question of privilege, and that the reading of the telegram which he sends up would require consent of the House.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I hope consent will be given for the reading of the telegram.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read the telegram, as follows:

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., March 31, 1896.
Hon. R. W. BLUE, M. C., Kansas Delegation,
Washington, D. C.:

You can say 25,000 railroad employees of Kansas will stand by Maj. Tom Anderson and the old soldier when the truth is known, as a good many members of the Leavenworth Home are ex-railroad employees, and who have had many grievances. We will carry this fight politically from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Lakes to the Gulf and from farm to factory. We owe no party any favors, but will fight oppression wherever found until this great wrong is corrected. Franklin and Smith should go.

D. F. MAHONEY,
THOMAS KEENAN,
HARRY ABBOTT,
Committee.

Mr. BLUE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the publications in the Leavenworth Times and in the Standard.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, if we are going to read newspaper clippings, I have a lot of them that I should be glad to have read.

Mr. BLUE. But this is a part of this very matter.

The SPEAKER. How much of the printed matter does the gentleman desire read? There are two columns of it.

Mr. BLUE. Just what relates to the dispatch. The dispatch has been read, and now I want the Clerk to read what is said about the dispatch and also the affidavit.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I submit that we should now take the vote, and let this question of privilege come up later.

Mr. HEPBURN. On this point of order, I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Indiana sent to the Clerk's desk to be read a dispatch purporting to come from A. J. Smith, in which the gentleman from Kansas was charged with having presented to the House a forged telegram. Now the gentleman from Kansas rises to a question of privilege. And has he not a right to do something more than simply to say he did not present a forged telegram? Has he not the right, during his remarks, to investigate the whole matter as part of his question of privilege, and to exonerate himself fully from the charge made against him? Can he not, as part and parcel of his vindication, show that as a matter of fact such a dispatch, if he had presented it, was true? May he not do this in defending himself from the assault that has been made upon him?

Mr. STEELE. In the first place, no gentleman has claimed that Colonel BLUE was responsible for the dispatch; and in the next place the "gentleman from Indiana" misunderstood the gentleman from Kansas, or the gentleman from Kansas misunderstood "the gentleman from Indiana." A great many dispatches had been read. I received a dispatch and on the instant went to him and asked whether among his dispatches he had read a certain dispatch. He said, "Yes; and I have abundance of evidence to support it." If my understanding was not correct and if he did not understand my question, then, of course, he is exonerated so far as I am concerned, and I ask that any reflection which may have been made upon him may be withdrawn.

Mr. HEPBURN. The question here is not whether the gentleman from Indiana is satisfied. It is a question of privilege, affecting the honor of this House. The gentleman from Kansas has been charged here publicly with a crime.

Mr. STEELE. I do not think so.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, has he not the right to do something more than to say that that charge was not justified? In meeting the charge, has he not the right not only to have read the dispatch in question, but also all the matter tending to establish it as a statement of truth?

Mr. BLUE. The reading will take only a moment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, what is the pending question? Is it a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that if this matter will take, as the gentleman from Kansas says, "only a moment," perhaps the easiest method of disposing of it would be to have the dispatch read.

Several MEMBERS. It has been read.

Mr. BLUE. The reading will take but a moment.

Mr. HULL. I understand that the dispatch was read, and now the gentleman proposes to have read two columns of newspaper comment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, what is the question of privilege here?

The SPEAKER. How much of the matter sent to the desk does the gentleman from Kansas desire to have read?

Mr. BLUE. Simply the two articles that are connected with this matter. The Clerk may omit the dispatch, because it has been read. I ask the Clerk to read simply the matter showing the denial, and then the copy of the affidavit showing that such a telegram was signed and forwarded. That is all I ask. It will not take two minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Two minutes! More likely half an hour.

Mr. BLUE. I think this will be simply fair treatment toward me under the circumstances.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Kansas will indicate what he wants read, as there are two columns of matter which have been sent to the desk—

Mr. BLUE. I do not want the Clerk to read two columns.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk now understands what the gentleman wants read, and he will proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

A few days since this paper, as a mere matter of news, published, at the request of a number of men, a telegram sent from the Western Union Telegraph office in this city to Congressman BLUE concerning the Soldiers' Home matter and signed by the names of three railroad men.

The following appeared in last night's Standard:

"We wish to state that the telegram published in the Leavenworth Times of Tuesday is absolutely false as coming from us, as the signatures were forged."

"DAN F. MAHONEY,
HARRY ABBOTT,
T. F. KEENAN."

Last night the following was brought to the Times office by a railroad man who claims that he was in the switch shanty at the time the telegram to Congressman BLUE was signed by the above men, and that he saw them put their signatures to it. He further says that a great pressure has since been brought to bear on these men to cause them to deny it.

Here is the affidavit, which is published to show that this paper acted upon sufficient authority, and which goes to prove its truth:

"STATE OF KANSAS, Leavenworth County, ss:

"Be it remembered that on this 2d day of April, 1896, before me, the undersigned, a notary public in and for the county and State aforesaid, came George R. McGraw, who is personally known to me to be the same person who deposes and says that on the 30th day of March, 1896, 'I was present and saw a message signed by one Keenan, Abbott, and Mahoney, to be sent to Hon. R. W. BLUE, at Washington, D. C., the purport of which was in reference to the railroad men standing by Maj. Thomas J. Anderson and the old soldiers in the Franklin-Smith fight.'"

"GEO. R. MCGRAW.

"Sworn to and subscribed in my presence this 2d day of April, 1896.
" [SEAL.] J. D. KELLER, Notary Public.

"My commission expires June 1, 1896."

Mr. BLUE. I think the reading explains this matter sufficiently.

The SPEAKER. The question now is—there is no amendment pending, as the Chair understands—

Mr. HULL. There are two amendments.

Mr. BLUE. If the chairman of the committee [Mr. HULL] will permit me, I want to make a suggestion. It has been suggested here again and again that this proceeding here—

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is this a reopening of the debate?

Mr. BLUE. No, sir. It has been suggested here again and again that this proceeding is not fair to General Franklin. Now, I am perfectly willing that this question shall go back to the Committee on Military Affairs; that the parties concerned be heard for a reasonable time; that the whole matter be investigated, so that no injustice shall be done. With that view, this question might be postponed for ten, fifteen, or twenty days, the substitute going to the committee along with the resolution.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Speaker, so far as that is concerned, we could not undertake to make an investigation by the Committee on Military Affairs, have witnesses summoned, and get through with all the necessary work in ten days or even two months. It will be useless to undertake it, and very expensive in the end. I think we may as well pass on the question now, and let the House determine it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Would it be in order or competent at this time to move a recommitment of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs without instruction? I think after the debate we have had the instructions would not be necessary to the committee to fully investigate, or at least so far as they could investigate, the matter and report to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the time to move a recommitment is not now, as the House has ordered a vote at this hour. The matter could be recommitted after the previous question was ordered on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HEPBURN. But that has not been asked, as I understand it. I would ask unanimous consent to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman. Is there objection to the gentleman from Iowa making a motion to recommit this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs without instruction?

Mr. HILL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE]. The Chair understands that an amendment is also offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], on which the point of order was raised.

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAHON. Let the vote first be taken on your amendment, and withhold the point of order.

Mr. BLUE. My amendment is to substitute the name of General Howard for that of General Franklin.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I believe the point of order was reserved on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will sustain the point of order; and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 55, noes 130.

[The result of the vote was received with applause.]

Mr. BLUE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 59, nays 153, not voting 142; as follows:

KATE GRANT.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3607) to increase the pension of Mrs. Kate Grant.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Mrs. Kate Grant, widow of the late Capt. (afterwards brevet-major, "for gallant and meritorious services before Petersburg, Va.," as per order of the War Department, dated Washington, D. C., June 15, 1865, signed Edwin M. Stanton) Charles E. Grant, of Company F, Fortieth Regiment New Jersey Infantry Volunteers, to $100 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by her, as evidenced by pension certificate numbered 270079.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 4 strike out the word "Mrs."
After the word "captain," in line 5, strike out the words in parenthesis, as follows:
"(Afterwards brevet-major, for gallant and meritorious services before Petersburg, Va., as per order of the War Department, dated Washington, D. C., June 15, 1865, signed Edwin M. Stanton.)"
Also strike out the words "one hundred," in line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TERRY, the title was amended so as to read "A bill to increase the pension of Kate Grant."

On motion of Mr. TERRY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SARAH E. BOYD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (S. 2557) granting a pension to Sarah E. Boyd.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill. The Chair is informed that the engrossed copy of the Senate bill is not here. Has the bill been reported from the House committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; a bill from the House committee precisely as it passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER. We should have the engrossed bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask permission to withdraw it until I get the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks permission to withdraw the bill temporarily.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to request unanimous consent to recommit the bill (H. R. 5108) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish eight pieces of condemned cannon to the Veteran Brigade, Grand Army of the Republic, Rochester, N. Y., and also four pieces of condemned cannon to the Brockport Soldiers' Monument Association, Brockport, N. Y., which was inadvertently reported from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California desires to have a bill recommitted which was reported by mistake. Without objection, the leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

MRS. MARIA B. BRINTON.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) granting a pension to Mrs. Maria B. Brinton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Mrs. Maria B. Brinton, widow of William F. Brinton, late a member of Company D, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $5 per month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if that bill has been considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. TUCKER. No; it has not.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am constrained to object to the continuation of these requests. Gentlemen do not come here on Friday nights to attend to these matters, and I object on that ground.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. TALBERT. I will state that I will object to the consideration of any bill that has not been considered at a Friday night session.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8012) donating one condemned cannon and balls to Grand Army of the Republic post of Sparta, Ill.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. I object, Mr. Speaker.

GEORGE JOHNSON.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4281) granting a pension to George Johnson, of Lenox, Iowa.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. I object.

SARAH E. BOYD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FLETCHER] now has the engrossed bill which was under consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change a word.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know the nature of that bill, and if it has been considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is the same bill about which I spoke to the gentleman this morning.

Mr. TALBERT. Has it been considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. FLETCHER. It has not been considered at a Friday night session, but it has been considered and recommended by the committee.

Mr. TALBERT. I am constrained to object, if it has not been considered at a Friday night session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] that this bill has passed the objection stage. Permission was given before, and the action of the House was suspended until the engrossed bill was found. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to make an amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to change the words "Sarah E." to "Sarah A."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that change will be made.

Mr. LOUD. That is, perhaps, a very dangerous holding of the Chair. The bill was withdrawn. The record will show that the Speaker made the statement that the bill was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the record, and if the gentleman from California is correct, why of course the bill is subject to objection.

Mr. PICKLER. Did not the Speaker hold that the bill would be withdrawn for the purpose of the gentleman substituting the engrossed bill? He had leave to substitute that bill.

The SPEAKER. These presentations for unanimous consent ought to be laid before the House in entire fairness. It is a very important matter to put upon one member the duty of making objections if he is opposed to a bill. Therefore it ought to be conducted in perfect good faith in every way.

Mr. PICKLER. I concede that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks on the notes of the Reporter the bill is not properly before the House, but is subject to objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will I have permission to withdraw the bill and present it at another time. [After a pause.] I wish to present the bill now, if I have recognition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman presents the bill for consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. TALBERT. I would ask the nature of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. If the gentleman will read the report it will show the nature of the bill. The recommendation of Commissioner Lochren is there.

The report (by Mr. SHOUR, for Mr. HANSBROUGH) was read, as follows:

A bill identical with this has been introduced in the House of Representatives in the present session and reported favorably and now pending on the House Calendar. Your committee append and adopt said report as a part of their report and recommend the passage of the bill.

HOUSE REPORT.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6808) granting a pension to Sarah A. Boyd, widow of George Boyd, late captain Company E, First Minnesota Infantry Volunteers, having examined the facts and circumstances in this claim, believe that the wound of leg, received while the soldier held the rank of first lieutenant, contributed to his death, and therefore earnestly recommend that she be pensioned at $17 per month.

The following letter from Judge Lochren, who was a comrade in service, concisely gives the soldier's history in service and the particulars of his death:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS.

"Washington, February 29, 1896.

"MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter with copy of H. R. 4461, a bill granting a pension to Sarah A. Boyd at the rate of $12 per month. She is the widow of Capt. George Boyd, who enlisted as a private in Company E, First Regiment Minnesota Infantry, April 29, 1861. I enlisted in the same company and served with him during the first three years of the war. He was an excellent soldier, and took part in all the battles in which the regiment was engaged, and was promoted to second lieutenant at the close of the peninsular campaign in 1862, and first lieutenant a short time later. In one of the battles he was severely wounded in the leg. He was mustered out with the regiment in May, 1864, and soon after assisted in raising a company for Hatch's Independent Battalion of Cavalry, and became its captain, and served as such until that battalion was mustered out in May, 1866.

"It appears that in the summer of 1879 said George Boyd was employed about the water power at the Falls of St. Anthony, in the Mississippi River, within the limits of the city of Minneapolis, Minn., and that in crossing the western channel of that river above the falls in an open boat with another employee, by some inadvertence they approached too near the brink of the falls, and, endeavoring to escape the apparent danger, both left the boat at a shoal place, and the other man, being active, saved himself, while Captain Boyd, being lamed and disabled from the wound in his leg referred to, was unable to escape, and was carried over the Falls of St. Anthony and drowned.

"Captain Boyd was a good citizen and a sober, industrious man, and his widow, Mrs. Sarah A. Boyd, is a very worthy woman.

"Yours, very truly,

"Hon. LOREN FLETCHER,
"House of Representatives, Washington, D. C."

"WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

[Law office of Gillilan, Willard & Willard, Guaranty Building.]

MINNEAPOLIS, January 20, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: Your kind favor of December 12, in the matter of the pension of Mrs. Sarah A. Boyd, widow of Capt. George Boyd, Company F, First Minnesota Volunteers, came duly to hand, for which please accept my thanks until better paid; but I have heard nothing since. Mrs. Boyd is after me quite lively to aid her, and so write you again to ask if you have seen Judge Lochren in the matter; and if so, is it apparent what we can do for her, if anything? I know so little about this business that I am at a loss to know just how to go to work at it. The widow is poor and needs the aid, and I should be very glad if we could do something for her, and I believe Judge Lochren feels in the same way about it. Will you kindly give me a line or two about it when convenient? And oblige

Yours, very truly,

J. B. GILFILLAN.

W. H. H. JOHNSON, Esq.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, according to the position I have taken, I shall have to object to that. I am not objecting to the pension, but I am objecting to the manner of consideration. I do submit that we have Friday night sessions, and gentlemen ought to come here and present these bills.

Mr. FLETCHER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask if I had recognition to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. That can not interrupt a motion to adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. I had the floor before the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 53.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum on a motion to adjourn. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Minnesota was making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FLETCHER. My inquiry is, was my bill under consideration before the gentleman's objection was made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it was not, under the statement made by the Reporter of what occurred.

JOHN E. WILBUR.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3659) for the relief of John E. Wilbur.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BREWSTER. I ask for the reading of the first part of the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The part of the report indicated was read.

Mr. BREWSTER. I ask for the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

USE BY THE UNITED STATES OF DEVICES COVERED BY LETTERS PATENT.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4178) providing for the use by the United States of devices covered by letters patent.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ERDMAN. I object to this.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, objection is withdrawn to the consideration of the bill I presented.

SARAH E. BOYD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina has withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota informs the Chair that objection is withdrawn to the consideration of his bill. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2557) granting a pension to Sarah E. Boyd.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah E. Boyd, widow of George Boyd, late captain Company E, First Regiment Minnesota Infantry Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $17 per month.

The amendment moved by Mr. FLETCHER was read, as follows:

Strike out the initial "E" and insert the initial "A"; so as to read "Sarah A. Boyd."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer a suggestion or two upon this bill before it is passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I would ask the gentleman how much this bill carries?

Mr. FLETCHER. Seventeen dollars a month.

Mr. LOUD. How much does this widow get now?

Mr. FLETCHER. Eight dollars.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say—

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to say to the gentleman that this is on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. LOUD. I understand. Mr. Speaker, I want once more to call the attention of this House to this case and many others we have passed this Congress. I do not suppose it will do any good, but still I am going to avail myself of the opportunity every time it is presented to me. Mr. Speaker, to present to this House and to present to the people of this country what this Congress is doing in the pension business. Now, here is a case where a widow is legally entitled to $8 a month, and who comes to Congress for no reason in the world, except she has a friend, perhaps, to introduce a bill and pass it through Congress increasing her pension to $17.

Now, this woman is no more entitled to a pension of $17 per month than any one of three or four hundred thousand other widows in this country who to-day receive but $8 a month. If this House wants to be honest and fair let it pass a bill increasing the amount of pension that a widow shall receive to $17, or to $30, or to $25 per month, if you have the nerve and courage to do it. If you can venture to face the country on that proposition, do it for every soldier's widow in the country; but I say again that so long as it is in my power I will avail myself of every opportunity to present to you and to the country the fact that you are singling out individual cases that have no special merit whatever, and granting pensions of double and three times, and in many instances of five times, the amount which the law allows. It is unfair, it is inequitable, it is unjust, it is unbecoming, to any legislative body in this country, and I hope the House will not pass this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 21; so the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title of the bill was amended to conform to the change made in the name.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8012) donating one condemned cannon and balls to Grand Army of the Republic Post of Sparta, Ill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to Grand Army of the Republic post, of Sparta, Ill., one condemned cannon and five cannon balls for the purpose of decorating the soldiers' monument in said place: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service, and that no expense is hereby incurred by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "place," in line 7, insert "and two condemned cannon and five cannon balls for the Grand Army of the Republic post at Morenci, Mich."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is it an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No; it is an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first put the question on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Also to donate to McDowell Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Enid, Okla., 1 condemned cannon and 15 cannon balls: Provided, That in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy such articles can be spared without detriment to the public interests: And provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if he is present.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs does not appear to be present.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I will ask the gentleman in charge of this bill, if he has any information upon the subject, to inform the House, as this seems to be growing into an omnibus bill, whether or not the cannon here provided for exist?

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. I understand so.

Mr. McMILLIN. In what numbers?

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. I do not know.

Mr. McMILLIN. From what source does the gentleman get his information?

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is a provision in the bill which reads: "Provided that in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy such articles can be spared without detriment to the public service."

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand that; but if the articles exist the fact ought to be shown to the House, and if they do not exist it is idle for us to pass this bill.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. This bill has gone through the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order against amending one private bill by adding to it another private bill. I do not understand that to be in order, and I think it is a bad precedent to make, and therefore I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Neither amendment has been objected to, and the gentleman from Illinois has asked for the previous question on the bill as it stands.

A MEMBER. That, if ordered, would exclude further amendments.

The SPEAKER. That would exclude further amendments. This discussion has been going on by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I had the floor and was making my inquiry before the gentleman from Illinois sought the floor to ask for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment offered by Mr. FLYNN was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, let the bill be read as it stands.

The bill as amended was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to Grand Army of the Republic post of Sparta, Ill., 1 condemned cannon and 5 cannon balls for the purpose of decorating the soldiers' monument in said place; and 2 condemned cannon and 5 cannon balls for the Grand Army of the Republic post at Morenci, Mich.; and also to donate to McDowell Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Enid, Okla., 1 condemned cannon and 15 cannon balls: Provided, That in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy such articles can be spared without detriment to the public interest: And provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPALDING, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill donating condemned cannon and cannon balls."

JAMES MILLER.

Mr. OWENS. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 2889. I want to say that this bill has no merit in the world except that of justice; and that being so, I suppose somebody will object to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2889) for the relief of James Miller, of Bourbon County, Ky.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay James Miller, of Bourbon County, Ky., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,570, in full of his claim for commissary and quartermaster supplies which were taken by the quartermaster of the Seventh Kentucky Cavalry for the use of the military forces of the United States during the late war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the right to object until I can hear the report.

The report (by Mr. PUGH) was read as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2889) for the relief of James Miller, submit the following report:

The bill asks an appropriation of $1,570 for the relief of James Miller to pay him for commissary and quartermaster supplies taken from him and used by a part of the Army of the United States during the late war between the States.

The petitioner claims, and the proof shows, that in July and August, 1862, J. W. Campbell, a quartermaster in the Seventh Kentucky Cavalry, took from said James Miller, of Bourbon County, Ky., 1,680 bushels of corn, valued at 40 cents per bushel, $672; 8,400 pounds of hay, at 75 cents per hundredweight, $630; 40 cords of wood, at $2.50 per cord, $100; 420 bushels of oats, at 40 cents per bushel, $168; making an aggregate claim of $1,570; that said Campbell, quartermaster as aforesaid, gave said James Miller a receipt therefor; that said Miller gave the receipt to a gentleman by the name of Hillock to be presented to Colonel Metcalf, of said Seventh Regiment, for his approval; that said Hillock in some way lost the said receipt, which has never been found, was never presented for payment, and has never been paid.

The proof further shows that said James Miller filed his claim in the Quartermaster's Department, but was refused payment thereof by reason of the fact that the Quartermaster-General was unable to certify that he was convinced of the loyalty of the claimant, as required by the act of July 4, 1864, section 300.

It is proper to state that several persons under oath, certified in due form of law, swear very fully and positively to the loyalty of said Miller before, during, and since the late war, which, while ex parte, makes a prima facie case of loyalty, at least, while on the other hand the question of his disloyalty rests wholly upon the naked, unsworn statement of one of the special agents of the Quartermaster's Department that several gentlemen say "Miller was disloyal beyond all doubt," etc.

These several gentlemen were not sworn—made simply and only unsworn statements, which were reported to the Quartermaster-General in an unsworn statement. By the rules of the Quartermaster's Department such statements are treated as competent and proper testimony. But your committee submit that in any court of justice, as well as before a committee of Congress, such statements can not be taken and held as competent testimony. The most that the statement of said special agent can do in this case, and all the weight it should have, is that it amounts to a suggestion of disloyalty. With sworn testimony in favor of loyalty and only a suggestion against it, your committee, in the light of law and fact, are compelled to decide in favor of the loyalty of James Miller, and do therefore determine that he is loyal.

Your committee therefore report back the bill and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. This bill comes from the Committee on War Claims. I should like to make an inquiry about it. Has the bill ever been presented to the Court of Claims in order that the loyalty of the claimant might be established?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to answer that question.

Mr. COX. I should like the gentleman in charge of the bill to answer it.

Mr. OWENS. As the reports set forth, the papers which would be necessary in taking this case into the Court of Claims have been lost. The proof, however, establishes very clearly the loyalty of the claimant.

Mr. COX. There are many claims of this character; and of course none of them can pass until the question of loyalty is first decided in the Court of Claims. I see no distinction between this claim and any other. But the committee report in this case that prima facie the claimant is loyal, while in thousands of other cases the claimants are obliged to go to the Court of Claims to establish their loyalty.

Mr. OWENS. The gentleman who reported this bill [Mr. PUGH] does not seem to be present.

Mr. COX. I do not want to make an objection; but I do not see any distinction between this claim and thousands of others in which the parties are obliged to establish in the Court of Claims their loyalty during the war.

Mr. OWENS. The committee say that the proof before them established very clearly the loyalty of this claimant; and the proof was equally clear in previous Congresses in which this bill was favorably reported.

Mr. COX. Why not send the case to the Court of Claims?

Mr. OWENS. I have already stated the reason why the case has not been taken to the Court of Claims. Of course gentlemen will have to determine this matter for themselves.

Mr. DINGLEY. In order that we may have time to examine into this question, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. OWENS. That leaves the bill before the House?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. OWENS. How so?

The SPEAKER. Because there has been no consent on the part of the House to its consideration.

Mr. OWENS. Well, there has been no objection.

The SPEAKER. All the same, the motion to adjourn disposes of it. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair lays before the House a report of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 116) authorizing the Public Printer to print the Annual Report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form and to bind it in one volume; when the Speaker signed the same.

JOHN C. DULL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resolution; which, by unanimous consent, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to request the Senate to furnish to the House a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 716) to correct the naval history of John C. Dull, the same having been mislaid or lost.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HUFF, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for two days, on account of business.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENTS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. COBB, asks to be excused from further service on the Committee on Banking and Currency. Without objection, he will be excused. The Chair hears no objection. The Chair appoints as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. COBB; as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. ALDRICH, and as a member of the Committee on Labor, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. VAN HORN.

The motion of Mr. DINGLEY that the House adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

UNION PACIFIC RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. WARREN. I submit a concurrent resolution; which I ask may be read, printed, and lie over under the rule.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Concurrent resolution to relieve third-party owners and innocent purchasers of Union Pacific Railway Company lands within the 40-mile limit of the Government grant.

Whereas, by an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also an act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, referring to the same subject, certain land grants were authorized to the Union Pacific Railroad Company; and

Whereas the Union Pacific Railroad Company completed its main line of railroad from Omaha, Nebr., to Ogden, Utah, in 1869, or about twenty-seven years ago, fulfilling the necessary requirements to entitle it to the benefit of the grants proposed; and the Government of the United States soon thereafter settled the location of the railroad or outer limit of the grant and declared the odd-numbered sections within that boundary to which the Union Pacific was entitled; and

Whereas there has since been no question as to the location of said railroad land, or outer limits thereof, or of the sections within the grant to which the Union Pacific Railroad Company was entitled on the main line of the Union Pacific Railroad in western Nebraska, northern Colorado, Wyoming, and Utah; and

Whereas the Union Pacific Railroad Company has, accordingly, with the knowledge and consent of the Government, disposed of a large quantity of this land at various dates during the last twenty or more years by sales to individuals, firms, and corporations for cash and by sales under contracts providing for installment payments during periods of ten or more years; and

Whereas, by an act of Congress approved July 10, 1886, the Union Pacific Railroad Company or its successors in title to these lands were compelled to pay taxes upon all such lands and have since been continually assessed town, city, county, and State or Territorial taxes against the same, as if they had been actually patented to the owners by the United States; and

Whereas a very large number of settlers throughout Wyoming and adjoining States have in the meantime paid in full for their homesteads and ranches and many more settlers are now completing or will soon complete the remaining payments due upon their lands, and are in some cases in possession of warranty deeds from the Union Pacific Railroad Company; in others have applied for the same; and in still other cases will within a short time so apply; and

Whereas the Union Pacific Railroad Company has, in obedience to the very numerous demands already made and other anticipated demands, and as it was in honor bound to do, proceeded in due and legal form to apply for patents from the United States, and has under the law and according to custom filed the several lists in the several land offices wherein such lands are situated, to wit, some 31 lists in all, every one of which is made up in whole or in part of lands long since sold by the railroad company, and amounting in the total to some 2,780,000 acres of land, over 95 per cent of which total has been disposed of by actual sale to settlers for cash in full, or cash in part, and contract for payment of balance; and

Whereas these thirty-odd lists, covering some 2,780,000 acres, have been duly forwarded to the United States Land Office and are yet unacted upon by said Land Office; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior, by verbal instructions given the Land Commissioner more than a year ago, caused the suspension of work upon the land lists in question, and later issued the following written orders as of the dates given therein, to wit:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, November 19, 1895.

"DEAR SIR: I have to request that until further ordered you will spend no time in preparing and forwarding to the Department lists of lands within the granted or indemnity limits of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, or any of their branch lines.

"Very respectfully,

"HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

"The COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE."

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 11, 1895.

"SIR: You are hereby requested not to prepare nor to submit for my approval any lists of lands applied for on account of the grant made to any bond-aided railroad.

"The order of November 19, 1895, is modified accordingly.

"Very respectfully,

"HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

"COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE."

And therefore no work is being performed upon such lists to prepare them for patent, and no patents are being issued; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior in his last annual report indicated that there was a necessity or at least a desirability of affirmative action on the part of Congress in order to protect the Government claims against the railway through the forfeiture of its undisposed of lands remaining from the grant, as follows:

"Land grants.—I have recently deemed it advisable to direct the Commissioner of the General Land Office to allow his force to give their time to selections of lands made by roads other than the bond-aided roads. I have not undertaken to pass finally upon the rights of the bond-aided roads, but I have considered, in view of the fact that this whole subject must come up before Congress, that it was advisable to leave the lands as they are for the present"; and

Whereas it appears improbable that Congress will reach the subject with a remedy during the present session; and

Whereas innocent purchasers of these railroad-grant lands can not give perfect title in sale, nor exhibit a sufficient abstract to enable them to borrow money upon such lands, and are greatly injured and impoverished thereby, some being already bankrupt and others with the savings of a lifetime in jeopardy because unable to raise money on lands to improve their homesteads, stock their ranches, and support and educate their increasing families in advancing years, or in some cases to even pay taxes on account of their patents so long overdue being withheld: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to rescind his orders to the Commissioner of the General Land Office suspending work upon the Union Pacific Railroad Company land lists now on file embracing lands along the Union Pacific main line in western Nebraska, northern Colorado, Wyoming, and Utah, and shall cause work thereon to be resumed and patents to issue to the Union Pacific Railway Company without delay to all lands described in the several lists now on file in the United States Land Office, upon which title is due to the Union Pacific Railway Company, in order to complete through the Union Pacific Railway Company good and sufficient title to the purchasers and present owners of such lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will go over under the rule.

FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask that the name of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] be substituted for that of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] as a conferee on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1247) to establish and provide for the maintenance of a free public library and reading room in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (H. R. 2324) granting an increase of pension to Lewis C. Schilling; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 85) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 131) relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2557) granting a pension to Sarah E. Boyd, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3607) to increase the pension of Kate Grant; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 160) to appoint four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The message further requested the Senate to furnish the House with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 716) to correct the naval history of John C. Dull, the original having been mislaid or lost.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 116) authorizing the Public Printer to print the annual report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form and to bind it in one volume; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

THE UNCOMPAHGRE RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, the Calendar is in order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I observe by the Calendar that the unfinished business is stated to be resolution numbered 121, known as the resolution for the bond investigation. Yesterday at the head of the Calendar appeared as the unfinished business what is known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation joint resolution. I desire to make the inquiry of the Chair as to how the joint resolution lost its place?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not present when that matter was under consideration yesterday. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] was in the chair. But after examining the RECORD this morning it is the opinion of the Chair that unanimous consent was given for the purpose of taking up the bond resolution and making that the unfinished business, and if that was done it displaced the prior unfinished business and sent it to the Calendar.

Mr. CANNON. In the numerous allusions to this subject which have taken place in this Chamber during some weeks past, especially since the proposed bond resolution was brought in, there has never been any understanding generally had by the Senators present, I think, that the joint resolution relative to the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation was to be displaced. Repeatedly, until the proceeding had become wearisome to the Senate, either myself or my colleague rose and asked that the joint resolution should retain its place as the unfinished business, and we received constant assurance that there was no intention to antagonize or displace the joint resolution. And so far as we have been made aware there was no action taken which would displace the joint resolution. It was the general understanding that the joint resolution should retain its place.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the Senator from Utah were now to move to take up the joint resolution and the Senate were to proceed with it until 2 o'clock, would not then the measure which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] has in charge come up as the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that it would.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps that method will satisfy both Senators. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar being now in order, the Chair understands that it is entirely competent for the Senator from Utah to move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CANNON. I will then inquire if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] is in attendance?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no information as to that.

Mr. HOAR (to Mr. CANNON). Move to take it up.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the joint resolution be taken up for present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution the title of which will be read.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask what will be the status of the bond resolution which was under consideration yesterday if the motion should be agreed to?

Mr. HOAR. The Chair has just said that it would be the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At 2 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It comes up at 2 o'clock regularly. Then the motion of the Senator from Utah to take up the joint resolution at this time—

Mr. HOAR. Does not affect that at all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It does not, I understand.

Mr. PEPPER. All that can be done with the joint resolution is to occupy the time until 2 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] has been, I understand, anxious to be present when the joint resolution is considered by the Senate, and this proposition seems to come at an unusual and extraordinary time. I hope the Senate will not consider the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps a suggestion that there is no quorum present would bring the Senator from Wisconsin here.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I shall certainly make the suggestion if there is any attempt to proceed with the joint resolution.

Mr. PLATT. I make it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Hill,	Platt,
Allen,	Davis,	Hoar,	Pugh,
Allison,	Dubois,	Jones, Ark.	Quay,
Bacon,	Faulkner,	Lodge,	Sewell,
Baker,	Frye,	McBride,	Sherman,
Bate,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Blackburn,	Gear,	Mantle,	Smith,
Brown,	George,	Martin,	Squire,
Burrows,	Gilson,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Teller,
Call,	Gordon,	Morrill,	Turpie,
Cannon,	Gorman,	Palmer,	Walthall,
Carter,	Gray,	Pasco,	Warren,
Chandler,	Hale,	Peffer,	Wetmore,
Chilton,	Harris,	Perkins,	Wilson,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Pettigrew,	Wolcott.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CANNON. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 102.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. VILAS to add the following proviso:

Provided, That any lands containing asphaltum, gilsonite, or like substances shall be reserved for proper disposition by Congress.

Mr. CANNON. In view of the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin, and being advised that he desires to continue his remarks on the pending amendment, I ask that the joint resolution may be temporarily laid aside for twenty minutes, until he can reach the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of the joint resolution may be postponed for twenty minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is postponed for twenty minutes.

MEDICAL AND DENTAL COLLEGES.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senate to consider the motion I entered to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (H. R.

5488) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical colleges in the District of Columbia. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] desires to have the motion disposed of. I should like to say a very few words on the subject. The bill contains the following provisions:

It shall be unlawful for any medical or dental college claiming the authority to confer, or actually conferring, the degree of doctor of medicine, or doctor of dental surgery, not incorporated by a special act of Congress to conduct its business in the District of Columbia unless such college shall be registered by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and granted by them a written permit to commence or continue business in said District in compliance with the requirements of this act.

It shall be the duty of the proper officers of any such college, before commencing or continuing business, to apply to the said Commissioners for registration.

And the "Commissioners are hereby authorized and required to make such regulations" as they may deem best.

It will be seen that instead of presenting, as is customary, the qualification of professors or teachers of any kind, the bill commits absolutely to the three Commissioners the power to say whether or not any person shall teach this particular science or profession. As to this being the plain requirement of the bill, there can be no doubt; the language needs only to be read to see that this is true. If this is not intended, the language should be changed.

A law which commits to three men the absolute power to allow or to refuse anyone permission to teach anything or give instruction in any science or profession—a censorship over human thought and expression—is not the modern system of protecting the public against wrongful opinions. It is certainly right that some protection should be afforded the public by some measure to ascertain and require qualifications of a scholastic or scientific nature of persons who shall practice the different professions, but that a blind authority should be given to three men to say to this one, "You shall," and to the other, "You shall not," is certainly an extraordinary proceeding. It is simply reviving the old idea of ancient and barbarous days, that learning, that human thought, that new discoveries should be submitted to the arbitrary will of some one or more persons.

But this bill goes a good deal further than that. It goes on to say—

That such of the officers and of the faculty of any such medical or dental college now in existence, and of every such college hereafter sought to be opened in said District, which shall continue or commence—

Not to practice the profession from which some harm might occur, but—to offer instruction in such capacity, without first obtaining registration and permit—

To instruct, to disseminate any opinion or theory which may be conceived—shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof upon an information filed shall be fined not less than twenty-five nor more than two hundred and fifty dollars.

I submit that no provision such as this since the days when the martyrs of science were burned for scientific discoveries and for teaching new ideas theretofore unknown is to be found in the history of any civilized country. It is to be a criminal offense created by law in this District to teach new ideas or a man's opinions upon these subjects.

Mr. President, if it be the will of this body to put upon the statute books in the District of Columbia a provision that a man shall be guilty of misdemeanor and imprisoned for free thought and for free opinion and theory and speculation upon any subject, then pass this bill; but I submit for one that it can never receive my approval nor be passed without my protest. The idea of imprisoning men because they have opinions different from the three Commissioners of this District or different from all the world is a barbarous idea. All the improvements of modern thought, all the new discoveries in medical or other sciences, have been opposed and are naturally opposed by the interest and the conservatism of the established teachers and professors.

Liberty of thought, freedom of speech, is the absolute essential of human progress, of all discoveries of science, of all new and useful inventions.

A law that no one shall teach or instruct men in a theory or practice of dentistry or medicine without a permit from three Commissioners, who know nothing about it, under penalty of fine and imprisonment certainly is not reasonable and can not be justified.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall occupy the time of the Senate but a moment in explaining this bill and in making a reply to the Senator from Florida.

The Senator from Florida is laboring under a very grave misapprehension when he says that any punishment whatever is to be inflicted upon any man for holding opinions or promulgating opinions. The penalties prescribed in this bill are for the teaching professedly in a school that is established contrary to law.

I will briefly state the circumstances of this case. Under the general incorporation act of this District any five persons can establish a theological, a medical, a dental, or any other school. They may not have any buildings, they may not have a corps of teachers, but they can proceed to issue diplomas; they can send out doctors and dentists and lawyers and preachers ad libitum, and there is no remedy in the existing law. This is something that ought never to have been done, and I apprehend that it was never contemplated when that act became a law.

The bill proposes to require the colleges that are now incorporated under the general incorporation act to go to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and show that they have the proper facilities for imparting instruction, and unless they can so show it provides that they shall be inhibited from continuing.

Mr. President, there are only three of these so-called colleges in the District, but that is more than enough. Every one of those colleges can come to Congress and ask Congress to incorporate it, precisely as the Georgetown University, the Columbian University, and Howard University have been incorporated. If they can show to the committees of Congress and to Congress that they have the facilities for imparting instruction equivalent to those required in the medical, dental, theological, and legal schools of the present day they will have no difficulty in getting a special act of incorporation from Congress. There is a scandal upon this community in regard to this matter, and the bill which the House of Representatives has passed simply proposes to remove that scandal and to put us in this respect upon a basis that will be to our own credit, to the credit of the professions, and to the credit of the people of the District of Columbia.

I trust that the motion to reconsider will not prevail, and I ask for the question to be put.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it is not the bill which the Senator has described to us that is now before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly it is.

Mr. CALL. It is not a bill to provide for special acts of incorporation. There will be no necessity for that. The bill is what I have read, the fourth section of which provides as follows:

That such of the officers and of the faculty of any such medical or dental college now in existence, and of every such college hereafter sought to be opened in said District, which shall continue or commence to offer instruction in such capacity without first obtaining registration and permit as hereinafter provided shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the police court of said District, upon an information similar to that filed in the case of violations of the police regulations made by the said Commissioners, shall be fined not less than $25 nor more than $250, and in default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned in the common jail of said District not less than thirty nor more than ninety days.

Now, what is a college? The Senator from Massachusetts observed the other day when this measure was up for discussion that a college under the Roman law was three persons. It is defined to be a society of persons associated for a common object. They need not be incorporated. Under this bill what I have said is literally true. It proposes to punish with fine and imprisonment in the District of Columbia any person who shall teach or offer instructions upon the subject of dental or medical science without the permit of the three Commissioners. It imposes a penalty of imprisonment upon them, and it is simply a revival of that censorship upon human thought and human discovery which characterized the barbarous ages of the world.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, a single word. I will read from the report of the committee.

Mr. CALL. I read from the bill. That is the thing to read from.

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee say in their report:

Under the general law—

That is, the incorporation act—

Under the general law any number or variety of medical colleges may be organized. A reference to it shows that any five persons may incorporate as an institution of learning a medical college, and may lawfully confer the degree of doctor of medicine without reference to the character of the teachers or their facilities for giving instruction in the science and art of medicine, and without legal requirements of any kind as to the qualifications of the candidate for such degree, either as to age, moral character, preliminary education, or duration or character of his course of instruction in medicine.

The District of Columbia is probably the only community in this entire country where the business of bogus diplomas can be carried on without let or hindrance from any source whatever.

I think this measure is understood by the Senate, and I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will allow me to incorporate in my remarks, by unanimous consent, a quotation from a medical book which has been sent to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to the Senator incorporating in his remarks anything he wishes.

Mr. CALL. Without reading the quotation, I ask leave to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A Huxley lifts up his voice to advance the cause in an international congress; a Virchow laid the foundation broad and deep in all his writings and lectures; a Schuessler, learned in pathology and every branch of science, familiar with the depths of the wonderful system, student of physiology and biology, who traced back through its mysterious wanderings the wonderful stream of life from cell to physical structure, and proclaimed all disease to be nature's cry for food—he, too, proclaimed the truths of biochemistry. The researches of this scholar has cleared away the rubbish of ages, overthrown poisons as remedies for the sick, proven that to supply deficiencies in human blood is the true materia medica, and laid a broad and solid foundation upon which to rear the fair temple of scientific healing.

Schuessler did for the biochemic theory what Sir William Blackstone did for the science of jurisprudence in his Commentaries upon the Common Laws of England, and what Dr. Samuel Hahnemann did for homeopathy.

Biology shows biochemistry to be a science. The practical counterpart of the abstract science of Virchow's "cellular pathology" is formed by cellular therapeutics, or the system of introducing molecular cell salts. Biochemic treatment is the outcome of the teachings of biology and those sciences which of late years have disclosed nature's ways and footsteps by aid of the microscope and spectroscope.

Let every medical man, every student, test this law and conscientiously apply the molecular tissue cell salts under given abnormal conditions, as indicated here, and he will not fail to attain good results. The action by chemical affinity of these triturated molecules of cell salts is certain, because fixed by that law. Close observation of little things is the secret of true science. None who watch the wonderful results in nature from infinitely minute causes will doubt the power of little things. Under the advance of biochemistry it has become possible to apply to each kind of tissue its own general definite and peculiar salt, according to its requirement in disease. By the distinctive symptoms our physicians are guided in their choice of the particular cell salts required—the immense varieties and complications of morbid states offering vast scope for exact medical practice wherewith to build up the great pyramid of scientific medicine of this advanced era.—The Biochemic System of Medicine, by Dr. George W. Carey, pages 25, 26.

Mr. CALL. I am not well informed enough to have an opinion of the merits of this system or the exact truth of these statements, but every student of the processes of the human mind will recognize in these statements the paths of true investigation and discovery. This bill makes the oral teaching or expression of these opinions without the permit of the three Commissioners punishable with fine and imprisonment. The Commissioners are good men and would not abuse this power, but it is wrong and ought not to be granted.

JAMES AND EMMA S. CAMERON.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, is the Calendar in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2289) for the relief of James and Emma S. Cameron for occupation and damages to property and for fuel taken and used by the United States Army during the war. The bill has passed both Houses at different times, but has not become a law.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WARREN April 7, 1896:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2289) for the relief of James and Emma S. Cameron, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The claim has been reported favorably upon by the Senate Committee on Claims in the Forty-second, Forty-third, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses, and a bill passed the Senate in the Forty-third, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses.

The claim has also been reported favorably to the House in the Fifty-first, Fifty-second, Fifty-third, and Fifty-fourth Congresses.

A copy of the Senate report, Fifty-second Congress, is hereto attached and made a part of this report.

Your committee recommend that the bill pass.

[Senate Report No. 135, Fifty-second Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 684) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to investigate the claim made for fuel alleged to have been taken and used by the United States Army during the war from the property in Chattanooga known as "Cameron Hill," and to provide for the payment thereof, having had the same under consideration, make the following report:

The same claim, but in the form of a bill to pay Emma S. Cameron for property taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war, was favorably reported by the Committee on Claims of the Senate of the Forty-second Congress and passed the Senate, but was not acted on in the House.

It was also reported upon favorably by the same committee of the Senate of the Forty-third Congress. It was also acted upon in like manner by this committee in the Fifty-first Congress, but amended in the Senate, to take substantially the form of the bill as now presented, and so passed the Senate. In each of said reports the allowance recommended was $10,000, and a like allowance was recommended by the Committee on War Claims of the House in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress.

James Cameron and Emma S. Cameron were before and during the late war of the rebellion the owners of a homestead in the suburbs of the city of Chattanooga, Tenn., known as Cameron Hill, containing about 37 acres, the same having been paid for out of the patrimony of Mrs. Cameron. The location was a beautiful and a commanding one. About 34 acres of this land were thickly covered with a forest of large oak trees. Two and a half acres were highly cultivated to orchard and grape. The dwelling house, studio, small house, barn, outbuildings, fences, and improvements were in a good state of repair. This property was occupied as a residence by Mr. Cameron and his wife at the time of the breaking out of the war. In September, 1863, the Union Army, under command of General Rosecrans, entered the city of Chattanooga and took possession of this property and made such use of the premises as the commander thought for the best interests of the Army.

The trees, including orchard, were cut down and mostly used by the troops for fuel; the same use was made of the fences and outhouses and all the structures except the residence.

The proofs show this was absolutely necessary, as the weather was extremely cold and there was no other available supply of fuel. The proofs make it further apparent that, for the purpose of maintaining its position at Chattanooga, the Army was compelled to further permanently injure and disfigure said premises by the erection of earthworks upon them, and that the residence, a commodious one built of concrete, and the premises were occupied and used by our troops until the close of the war.

The loyalty of Mr. Cameron and his wife was so marked and their cheerful sacrifices for the aid and comfort of the Union soldiers so frequent and constant as to attract the attention and secure the good will of the commanding and many subordinate officers of our Army.

By special field order No. 6, Major-General Rosecrans appointed a commission to adjust claims against the United States.

Mr. Cameron and his wife filed claim before this commission for the destruction of the buildings, fences, timber, orchards, and other injuries done this property and for the use and occupation of it by the Union troops.

Upon the proofs taken at the time a finding was made in their favor of $20,000. Numerous affidavits and documents attest the loyalty of Mr. and Mrs. Cameron and the fact of fences, buildings, and timber being consumed by the Federal Army for fuel.

Among the documents submitted to the committee in support of this claim is the following letter from Maj. Gen. U. S. Grant, commanding the armies of the United States, addressed to Mrs. Cameron:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,

"City Point, Va., August 9, 1864.

"MY DEAR MADAM: Your letter of the 8th of July was duly received but not so promptly answered. I know yours to be a case where prompt payment should be made, and am willing to indorse your claim. I believe that your property at Chattanooga has been appraised by a board of officers. If so, send me the proceedings of the board, and I will make my indorsement and return them to you. If you have no such evidence of the claim inform me, and I will order a board to assess it and will indorse the proceedings. This will be the first step toward a collection.

"Yours, truly,

U. S. GRANT.

"Mrs. CAMERON."

And also the following indorsement made by General Grant upon the statement of the claim as made to commission under field order No. 6:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,

"City Point, Va., October 25, 1864.

"I know the property within described, and the parties owning it, well. Mr. Cameron and his wife have been unflinching friends of the Government from the beginning of our troubles to the present day. There are no more thoroughly loyal people anywhere in the North, and they are entitled to protection and pay for their property converted to Government use. What is now known as Fort Cameron, Chattanooga, was the private property of Mr. Cameron. From its elevated and commanding position it had to be taken and fortified. By this means the entire property with improvements has been entirely destroyed for private use. I would recommend that the property be purchased at a fair valuation for Government use."

"U. S. GRANT, General."

The committee recommend that the bill pass, with the amendment that the allowance made and paid shall not exceed $10,000, and that such amendment be made by adding the following to the end thereof:

"Provided, That no greater amount than $10,000 shall be allowed or paid to such person or persons."

Mr. COCKRELL. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who introduced the bill, to the fact that no appropriation is inserted on the face of the bill, as he will see by a reference to it. The bill reads:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Emma S. Cameron, in full satisfaction and payment for occupation and damage to her separate property and for fuel taken therefrom and used by Gen. W. S. Rosecrans's army while at Chattanooga, Tenn., from September 1863, until the close of the war.

No amount is specified. Then the bill proceeds to say:

And which amount of $10,000 was found due by a special commission appointed by Major-General Rosecrans to adjust claims against the United States on full proof and investigation of the facts.

The bill, however, does not authorize the payment of $10,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. That ought to be corrected.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to insert after the word "pay," in line 4, the words "the sum of $10,000"; so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the sum of $10,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury, etc.

Mr. WARREN. That should have been in the bill, and I supposed it had been incorporated. It must have been omitted by an oversight.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL NEW HAVEN BANK.

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1365) for the relief of the National New Haven Bank of the State of Connecticut. This is for the payment of a claim which is now twenty years old, and which has passed the Senate twice and the House of Representatives once. There is no earthly objection to it, and I ask that it may be considered and acted upon at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1365) for the relief of the National New Haven Bank of the State of Connecticut. It proposes to pay the National Bank of New Haven $3,519.15.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1902) granting a pension to Jennie E. Burch.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the twenty minutes have expired for which the joint resolution of the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] was postponed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to be courteous to the Senator from Wisconsin and to give way to him, but I must be courteous to the entire Senate, which has consented to the postponement of this question for twenty minutes at my request; and as there are remarks to be made by my colleague [Mr. BROWN], if he shall proceed the Senator from Wisconsin may arrive before his address shall have been concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment heretofore submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Wisconsin, I know, desires to be present and wishes to be heard on this question. He is prepared to speak upon it, and I hope the joint resolution will not be passed in his absence, for I am sure that he had no idea that it was to come up this morning or he would have been here. I do not think it fair to pass an important matter of this character, to which there is objection on his part and on which he desires to address the Senate. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Utah will not insist upon going on now with the consideration of the joint resolution. There is only five minutes left before, as I understand, another matter will come before the Senate, and there is no time to debate the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the liberty of informing the Senator from Arkansas that the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] gave notice that his colleague [Mr. BROWN] desires to submit remarks on the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. BERRY. I did not know it.

Mr. BROWN. I did not care to make remarks at this time, but before the joint resolution shall be passed I desire to discuss it. If the Senator from Arkansas has any suggestions to make by which the matter can soon be disposed of we will listen to it with great pleasure. We have waited for the Senator from Wisconsin time and time again, and he showed his appreciation of our courtesy by trying yesterday to close us out and put the joint resolution back on the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY. I can not hear the remarks of the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. What I have to say will apply to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin and in reply to the remarks which he has already partly made.

Mr. BERRY. I did not know the Senator desired to submit any remarks upon the question, or I should not have said a word. I thought the effort was to pass the joint resolution at once.

Mr. BROWN. I am not particular that the joint resolution be taken up now, but we want it disposed of when it is taken up. I shall be very brief in what I have to say upon it, if it is to be brought up at this time. If there be no other suggestion of delay on the part of the friends of the Senator from Wisconsin, we shall ask for a vote. All that I was at present going to call the attention of the Senate to was the peculiar nature of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. It is an amendment not so much to the joint resolution which is now before us, to which I will call attention briefly; the joint resolution which is now before the Senate is one asking the Interior Department to carry out a law which was passed nearly two years ago; and now that the joint resolution is before the Senate, the Senator from Wisconsin moves to amend by this peculiar amendment, which says in substance:

Provided, That where any mines exist upon the premises, the lands shall be reserved from sale and be sold to the highest bidder.

An amendment of this character is one to change the entire policy of the United States. For nearly forty years it has been the policy of the Land Department of the United States and the policy of Congress, in disposing of public lands, to sell them to the actual settler, to the homesteader, to the miner, to those who will use them, and not sell them for speculation. Prior to that, more than thirty-five years ago, it was considered the proper thing to sell, after advertising, to the highest bidders, to speculators, and the money made out of the sale of the lands was received into the Treasury. But it has since then been the policy of the United States to encourage the citizen to occupy and to improve the lands, and under it we obtain greater wealth than would result from the mere money that can be procured from the lands themselves. The homesteader who has settled and improved 160 acres of land brings to this country greater remuneration than can be procured by selling the land to some speculator.

It is true that the United States might pick out here and there choice pieces and say, "We will advertise these for sale and get more than $1.25 an acre, or get much more than is given by the homesteader"; but we lack in selling lands the real good—we lack the benefit of the citizen.

Mr. President, the policy which was outlined for the homesteader has also been the policy of the United States toward the miner. When gold was discovered in California and it became known all over the United States and the whole world that those sands were of inestimable value the lands were unsurveyed; there was no law which permitted the miner to take them. The United States could have sold them had it so wished. Had they been possessed with the sentiment which seems to actuate the Administration and the Senator from Wisconsin to-day, they could have said, "We will put up at public auction these valuable sands, and he that shall give the most for them shall have them." But, on the other hand, by a generous policy the miners were permitted, without any express statute, to divide those lands among themselves by their local laws and customs, by exerting purely practical republicanism or democracy. There was no statutory law in existence, and the miners disposed of those valuable lands among themselves. The United States stood by and recognized such disposition, and it was known to be the policy of the United States to upbuild the mining industry. Not only was that the policy with regard to the California placers, but when, in the midst of our civil war, the great Comstock lode was discovered—which was, if I remember rightly, before any act of Congress was passed upon the subject—instead of the United States coming forward and saying as to those vast silver deposits discovered on the public domain, "We will sell them," they offered substantially a bounty to the miners; they gave them the lands for the nominal consideration of occupying them; they built for the miners of the Comstock lode the Sutro tunnel.

To go a little further, Mr. President, in 1866 Congress passed a law providing that all valuable mineral deposits in the lands of the United States should be free and open for exploration to whomsoever should locate and find the mineral thereon. The lands which we are now considering were in that category. They were the public lands of the United States; they had these valuable minerals upon them; they were free and open to the exploration of the miner, and ought to remain as such, and I claim are still public lands of the United States.

In 1880 this tribe of Uncompahgre Indians were residing in Colorado, and, on account of some depredations which they then committed, were induced to sell their lands to the United States, receiving for them a million and three-quarters of money, which was deposited in the Treasury of the United States. It is there now. They ceded away by treaty all they ever had. In that treaty they were permitted to go to the mouth of the Gunnison, in the State of Colorado, and temporarily occupy land; but, instead of going there, for some reason or other, probably because they were surrounded by soldiers and forced to go elsewhere, they were brought into what is now the Uncompahgre Reservation, a part of the public lands of the United States, and were allowed to remain there simply as occupants. They had no right there; they were simply there at the pleasure of the Government from 1880 to 1883. In 1882, there being no law and no right for the Indians to be at this place, the President of the United States issued an Executive order setting aside this Uncompahgre Reservation for their use, and they remained on that reservation from that day until 1894, when Congress passed an act, which has been read here and to which I will call attention. I will read two sections of the act, which are as follows:

SEC. 10. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission of three persons to allot in severalty to the Uncompahgre Indians within their reservation, in the Territory of Utah, agricultural and grazing lands according to the treaty of 1880, as follows:

"Allotments in severalty of said lands shall be made as follows: To each head of a family one-quarter of a section, with an additional quantity of grazing land not exceeding one-quarter of a section; to each single person over 18 years of age one-eighth of a section, with an additional quantity of grazing land not exceeding one-eighth of a section; to each orphan child under 18 years of age one-eighth of a section, with an additional quantity of grazing land not exceeding one-eighth of a section; to each other person under 18 years of age born prior to such allotment one-eighth of a section, with a like quantity of grazing land; Provided, That with the consent of said commission any adult Indian may select a less quantity of land if more desirable on account of location: And provided, That the said Indians shall pay $1.25 per acre for said lands from the fund now in the United States Treasury realized from the sale of their lands in Colorado as provided by their contract with the Government. All necessary surveys, if any, to enable said commission to complete the allotments shall be made under the direction of the General Land Office.

"Said commissioners shall, as soon as practicable after their appointment, report to the Secretary of the Interior what portions of said reservation are unsuited or will not be required for allotments, and thereupon such portions so reported shall, by proclamation, be restored to the public domain and made subject to entry as hereinafter provided."

SEC. 21. That the remainder of the lands on said reservation shall, upon the approval of the allotments by the Secretary of the Interior, be immediately open to entry under the homestead and mineral laws of the United States: Provided, That no person shall be entitled to locate more than two claims, neither to exceed 10 acres, on any lands containing asphaltum, gilsonite, or like substance: Provided, That after three years' actual and continuous residence upon agricultural lands from date of settlement the settler may, upon full payment of $1.50 per acre, receive patent for the tract entered. If not commuted at the end of three years the settler shall pay at the time of making final proof the sum of $1.50 per acre.

Here was a plain, clear statement of the law to be executed by the Administration, and yet all that ever was done was to examine these lands first and see how many were agricultural and suitable for the Indians. The Secretary of the Interior has done it. He finds there were few or none in the whole reservation; he knows every acre which is suitable for occupation by the Indians; but, although that has been accomplished, he declines to allot the lands to the Indians, and declines to open the reservation. Why? Because he says he does not approve of this legislation. He asks us now to set aside the policy of the United States which has existed for forty years, and in this case expose for sale these gilsonite beds. To that proposition we ask the attention of the Senate.

Without standing here to denounce the Secretary of the Interior or the Administration, I submit to the Senate whether that is a proper answer to a bill which has passed both Houses of Congress and received the approval of the Executive. "I do not think," he says, "that the legislation was properly understood." We ask now that this amendment may be voted down and that the law may be enforced.

I had intended, in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin, to say a word or two as to the rights of those who had gone into these gilsonite beds and made mineral locations; but, as he is absent, perhaps it will be unnecessary for the illustration of the question we have now before us. Should anything in the future be said on that subject, I may add something on it at a later day. Now, we ask that the Senate vote down this amendment, which is in the teeth of the policy of the United States and contrary to the law which was passed two years ago.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the joint resolution may go over until to-morrow on account of the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BROWN. It can come to a vote now. If it goes over until to-morrow, it will be just as before. To-morrow will be Saturday.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin gave notice yesterday, or the day before, that he desired to be heard on this question. It is a very important matter, and I trust it may go over, without prejudice, to be called up as soon as he comes in. There ought to be no opposition to that.

Mr. BROWN. As I said in the first place, I should be very glad to accommodate the Senator from Wisconsin. I suggested before that we would do anything we could to accommodate him; but we have been doing that for a month, and when we wait for him he says that we are out of order, because everything is delayed by this joint resolution, instead of hurrying it forward. It has come now to a hearing. We were told by one of his friends the other day that it was our business to be in the Senate and attend to and watch this joint resolution. Now the Senator from Wisconsin is absent. It is his business to be here and he ought to be here, to use the language which was used the other day, if he wants to be heard on the joint resolution. I think we shall ask that the amendment be voted on at this time.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Maryland, if he stops to consider, will see that it is impossible for us to go ahead and do what he suggests. We should not keep half a dozen unsettled matters before the Senate awaiting the convenience of Senators who are in the city, possibly in the Senate, and whose convenience it may be not to be able to speak at a particular moment. I see no reason—there is no reason apparent to my mind—why this joint resolution should wait for the presence of the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator when it was known that it was before the Senate, was the unfinished business, and was liable to be acted upon at any time.

It must be evident to Senators that there is some purpose back of this constant attempt to delay these various resolutions and bills which are the unfinished business before the Senate; and if there is, it might as well be developed now as at any other time. I think the Senate should proceed with the business in an orderly way and dispose of some of these questions.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the statement from the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island. It is the first intimation we have had from the leader on the other side of the Chamber, who has charge of the business of this Congress and responsibility for enacting legislation at this session. His party has every committee of this body by a majority vote of the Senate. We on this side surrendered as gracefully as it was possible to the combine on the other side; we have looked forward to the expediting of the business of this Congress, and hoped that it would be pushed along much more rapidly than it has been. There has been no delay on this side, no obstruction to any matter, but we have been a good deal puzzled to find the reason why my distinguished friend from Rhode Island and his colleagues have not marked out some well-defined programme which we might follow.

I took the liberty, at the suggestion of one or two of my friends on this side of the Chamber, the day before yesterday to suggest that as to this great privileged question which is before the Senate, involving the right to a seat in this body, a time should be arranged for a vote, but it was met immediately with the response from the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the other side that that could not be done; that even a suggestion for an arrangement could not be entertained for a week or ten days. We are ready to-day to agree to any proper programme for the conduct of business. The majority have never yet suggested one until just now, when the Senator from Rhode Island made the suggestion he did.

Here is a subject brought up by a vote of the Senate this morning on which the Senator from Wisconsin desires to be heard. I think it is more than an ordinary matter with him; I think some suggestion has been made of views opposite to his, on which he regards it as absolutely necessary that he should be heard. Unfortunately, he is detained from the Senate this morning for personal reasons.

My only suggestion was that the matter should go over without prejudice, to be called up the moment the Senator from Wisconsin returns. I have never known the Senate to refuse such a request. The Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON], who first brought the matter to the attention of the Senate, understood and appreciated thoroughly that that was the case.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion respecting the Utah matter. The Senate has consumed several weeks in the discussion of a question which no court of record in the whole world would give either side more than two hours to discuss. Continuous speeches have been made here by Senators that have lasted over three days. We have taken up the question and looked at it from every point of view. We have done everything respecting it except vote upon it, which is probably the most remote contingency that we can look forward to.

No Western matter has been called up in the Senate during the entire session or considered in the slightest degree, and here is a new State in the Union, with its wants and its needs, asking, through its Senators, that the Secretary of the Interior carry out existing law. That is all it does. It does not ask for legislation, but that the Secretary of the Interior carry out existing law. It has been met with opposition of the most remarkable and persistent character. Day after day the consideration of the joint resolution has been adjourned and put over for one reason or for one pretext or another.

Now, I have no doubt that it will go over again to-day because the Senator from Wisconsin is not here; but I do appeal to Senators who ask this renewed courtesy that they in their turn, when another day shall come, instead of throwing obstacles in the way of passing upon this measure, will feel doubly bound to further its consideration and action upon it. It is just and it is fair, and by whatever tactics it is postponed day after day, whether it be by appropriation bills or matters that are spoken of as questions of the highest privilege, or whether it is to be made the football of party politics, in which one side of the Senate or the other is to seek an advantage by charging the other with delaying the proceedings of the Senate, I trust that the endeavor of this new State, represented by its Senators here, who intelligently and fearlessly are seeking to do their duty and to have the laws of the country obeyed, may be met by some sort of cooperation and not by obstruction.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. I give way to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland and the country understand that neither of the great political parties has a majority in the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. We do not understand that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should think the Senator has had reason to know it on many occasions. If there was a combine, as he says there was, as to the organization of the committees of this body, certainly there have been many combines of a more effective nature between the Senator from Maryland and his friends and the gentlemen who hold the balance of power in the Senate from that time to this. The Senate and the country perfectly understand that there is no majority on the part of either of the great political parties in the Senate, and that neither party by itself is responsible for legislation or for the course of business in the Senate.

We are all equally responsible, I take it, for the orderly conduct of the business of the Senate and for proceeding with its business to a conclusion, in order that the country may be relieved, if that is the proper word, of the further session of the Congress of the United States for some time to come.

The Senator from Maryland asks me why we do not have a programme in regard to this matter. I suggest that we now have a programme, which shall be agreed upon by both sides of the Chamber, to dispose of the questions that are now before the Senate, either wholly or partly, as unfinished business or otherwise. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that if he desires to accommodate the Senator from Wisconsin, we shall have an agreement to take a vote upon this question without further discussion after the Senator from Wisconsin shall have concluded his remarks. I take it for granted that nobody on this side of the Chamber cares to discuss the question further, and if that is the case, I suggest that, without further debate, we have a vote at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I suggest that on one other occasion this question was made the unfinished business to follow a certain order of business then upon the Calendar. It was held in that position for a week or ten days, and then it became the unfinished business at the head of the Calendar on the conclusion of the first unfinished business.

If the matter might once more be placed in that attitude, to become the unfinished business immediately upon the conclusion of the bond resolution now before the Senate, I am satisfied it would meet with approbation.

Mr. ALDRICH. There will be no other discussion on this side of the Chamber?

Mr. CANNON. No; unless some points altogether new to the discussion so far developed shall be brought forward by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is perfectly well understood as to this matter that the discussion of it is not to change anybody's vote. It is largely a moot discussion of the question. The speech of the Senator from Wisconsin or any other speeches may be made just as well upon some other measure as upon the pending resolution, I take it.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senator from Maryland whether he is willing to consent to the suggestion which I have made for the disposition of this matter?

Mr. GORMAN. Of course I know the tactics of my distinguished friend the Senator from Rhode Island. He disclaims for the other side of the Chamber all responsibility for the management of the Senate. It is perfectly well known that the party in this Chamber which has control of the committees must necessarily control legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Experience has shown us that that is not true.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator from Maryland think that that party could pass a tariff bill if it could get it up here some day?

Mr. GORMAN. We will come to the matter of the tariff later on. But I wish to say now, in answer to the Senator from New Hampshire, that his party will be held responsible by the country, and if it proceeds to make appropriations beyond the resources of the Treasury of the day without providing revenue the responsibility therefor is with the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maryland, with his solemnity, has frightened me on various occasions, both personally and in reference to the Republican party. But we are both getting on very well at this time, and I really wish the Senator would be more cheerful and aid us to go on to the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. GORMAN. I am delighted that I have succeeded in frightening the Senator from New Hampshire. I have accomplished a great feat, for he has recently frightened his own party. [Laughter.] However, that is aside from what I wish to say on this case. Mr. VILAS entered the Chamber.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin has just entered the Chamber. So I presume we shall have no trouble about proceeding with the Utah matter.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator from Wisconsin is here and is prepared to go on, I have nothing further to say in the matter except to remark to the Senators from Utah that I myself have no disposition to delay the vote upon their joint resolution. It is not that; but I have never before known a case in the Senate when a Senator who desired to speak on a subject was absent and detained, as in this case, accidentally, that the measure was not passed over during his absence, to be taken up on his return.

Mr. BROWN. Allow me to interrupt the Senator from Maryland. I was about to say that if the Senator from Wisconsin was absent we would wait until to-morrow for a vote to be taken.

Mr. GORMAN. That is all I suggested. As to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], who thinks there is politics in everything suggested on this side of the Chamber, I have only to say that we shall be very glad to make some arrangement looking to the order of business in the Senate. Such an arrangement has not been suggested by the other side of the Chamber having charge of the committees. We can not in this piecemeal way take up one measure and another by unanimous consent. I wish to give notice now, Mr. President, that I shall object at any time during the present session if I am in the Chamber to further unanimous-consent agreements for the consideration of any measure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Of a general character.

Mr. GORMAN. Of a general character and other than the appropriation bills.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will join the Senator from Maryland in that declaration.

Mr. GORMAN. It is a practice which has grown up that results in inconvenience and I think in a delay of business. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] suggests to me that my statement is rather broad. I do not mean as to unanimous-consent agreements to take up a measure immediately, but I mean arrangements to fix a time a week or ten days ahead or any other time in the future.

Then, in addition, if Senators on the other side of the Chamber, who have all the chairmanships of the great committees of this body, desire, as we have done usually, to designate the public measures in the order in which they shall be considered, which saves time and serves everybody, we shall be glad to consider it. It is always done and suggested to the minority. We on this side are in the minority, and we have waited for such a proposition. There has been no obstruction and no attempt to obstruct; but from now on, for the balance of this session, there will be, as there has been, and always ought to be in this Chamber, very thorough discussion of matters of public importance. There will be no attempt on our part, so far as I know, to obstruct legislation. There will be prevented, so far as we can prevent it, undue haste in respect to matters to dispose of which there may be a desire on the part of gentlemen who may wish to go off for the summer season or on other matters which might be suggested by my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], who always thinks there is politics in every suggestion made on this side. That is all there is in the matter. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] is now present, and he can manage his own case.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say a word. I have always understood that unanimous-consent agreements toward the close of a session are subject to the right of the Appropriations Committee. That right is not always reserved, but it has been the rule of the Senate for a great many years, as I know that a measure which has been taken up by unanimous consent can be temporarily laid aside to allow the Appropriations Committee to proceed with a bill. If that is understood, there can not be any objection to a unanimous-consent agreement or the taking up of a measure by vote. It is understood. The right of way is reserved all the time to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I understand that the joint resolution came up this morning by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was taken up on motion.

Mr. VILAS. For consideration in the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair—

Mr. HILL. I will inform the Senator from Wisconsin that it will have to give way at 2 o'clock to the regular unfinished business.

Mr. ALDRICH. That depends upon whether the Senate so determines or determines otherwise.

Mr. HILL. And I am so desirous of continuing my remarks, that I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not speak later than 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not present when the order was made, but he is informed that the resolution was taken up by a vote of the Senate this morning.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I have no interest in the joint resolution in any way except such as every Senator on this floor has. I have been ready at every moment when request was made to take up the measure. Yet there has been, as I judge from the RECORD, a singular felicity in the attempt to take up the joint resolution when I did not happen to be in the Chamber or a felicity of choice of the time when I happened to be absent.

I am put to the duty of calling the attention of the Senate to the facts in the case, both against my inclination and very much against my personal feeling in many respects. But it happens that I had some service on a committee of the Senate which compelled me to acquire knowledge of the facts relating to this business, and the Senate ought to know the facts. If when those facts are known to the Senate they choose to deliver over this property, which is worth in revenue to the United States, if properly employed, hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, for the nominal price of $5 or $10 an acre to some persons who may thereby be very much enriched at the cost of the public, the Senate is at liberty to do it.

It is true, as I am told, that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] made the remark this morning that no facts and no arguments would make any difference with his opinion.

Mr. ALDRICH. No, no. I said the opinion of the Senate; I did not say my opinion.

Mr. VILAS. The opinion of the Senate. It matters not, I suppose, then, in the judgment of the Senator from Rhode Island, that this is an attempt to take from the public a large amount of valuable property and bestow it on some private individuals.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the resolution is a concurrent resolution, and can not become legally effective as a law of the United States; and whether it is passed or not, it is merely an expression of opinion on the part of the two Houses of Congress. It will not change the opinion, I take it, of the present Administration or the present Secretary of the Interior, and from that standpoint I said that the discussion was a purely academic discussion.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is a joint resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a concurrent resolution.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Rhode Island is, naturally enough, in error in his fundamental preface. The resolution is a joint resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then it has been changed since it was first presented.

Mr. VILAS. No; it was not even a concurrent resolution when first presented.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was a concurrent resolution when I saw it.

Mr. VILAS. I believe I am right in saying that it was a joint resolution at the beginning. The Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] knows.

Mr. CANNON. This particular resolution was introduced as a joint resolution. There was a resolution on the same subject formerly submitted which was a concurrent resolution.

Mr. VILAS. It was never the subject of debate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I knew there was a concurrent resolution upon the same subject before the Senate, and I supposed this was the same resolution. I take it for granted that the present chief of the Democratic Administration would not approve the joint resolution, which is substantially a vote of a want of confidence in himself and in his Secretary of the Interior. So, whatever may be said or done here, I repeat, is not likely to affect the result in this case in a legal way.

Mr. VILAS. Is it likely to affect the vote of the Senate?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know.

Mr. VILAS. I understood the Senator's remark was that it would not affect the vote of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have great confidence in the skill, capacity, eloquence, and use of language of the Senator from Wisconsin. I have seen it exemplified on many occasions in the Senate, and I have no doubt—

Mr. VILAS. That is not the question which is presented to the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the question which the Senator asked me was whether his speech would not change it.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator could not have understood anything of the kind.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the question—

Mr. VILAS. The question was whether facts in relation to this matter when presented would affect the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the question the Senator put to me was whether his speech was likely to affect the vote in the Senate.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator's remark was made before I came in.

Mr. ALDRICH. I imagine that the facts to be stated by the Senator from Wisconsin will be given due weight and consideration by the Senate, as his remarks always are, but I adhere to my original proposition, that the chances are that no vote will be changed by his speech.

Mr. VILAS. I presume the Senator very correctly speaks for himself. I should have very little expectation of altering by any array of facts his opinion as to something upon which he had determined to cast his vote. I do not understand that the Senate is entirely of the same opinion or that it adopts the same rule of practice which the Senator from Rhode Island has indicated. Therefore I desire to call attention to the facts in this case. I might perhaps abbreviate something of what should be said by reference to what has been said, but it has already become matter of ancient history from the course of business in the Senate. Therefore I feel authorized to recall it.

The proposition which is made in effect by the joint resolution is to subject the very valuable lands lying on the eastern side of the Uncompahgre Ute Reservation, within four townships particularly, upon which veins of gilsonite of enormous value have been found, to the claims of certain alleged prospectors, by which the lands are to be taken at a nominal price per acre. I undertook to explain the history of this attempt and I desire to repeat something of it. I called attention to the fact that during the Fifty-first Congress, when everything that was extravagant, that tended to dissipate the public property and the public moneys, found a ready sort of acceptance in Congress, a bill was passed to give effect to this purpose, and that it was vetoed by General Harrison, and his veto message, very moderately expressing objection to the bill, was at least such that no attempt was made to induce Congress to pass the bill over his veto. In that message he said of the legislation:

The object, then, of this legislation is to be sought not in any public demand for these lands for the use of settlers—for if they are susceptible of that use the Indians have a clear equity to take allotments upon them—but in that part of the bill which confirms the mineral entries, or entries for mineral uses, which have been unlawfully made "or attempted to be made on said lands." It is evidently a private and not a public end that is to be promoted. It does not follow of course that this private end may not be wholly meritorious, and the relief sought on behalf of these persons altogether just and proper. The facts, as I am advised, are that upon these lands there are veins or beds of asphaltum or gilsonite, supposed to be of very great value.

Entries have been made in that vicinity, but upon public lands, which lands have been resold for very large amounts. It is not important, perhaps, that the United States should in parting with these lands realize their value, but it is essential, I think, that favoritism should have no part in connection with the sales. The bill confirms all attempted entries of these mineral lands at the price of $50 per acre (a price that is suggestive of something unusual) without requiring evidence of the expenditure of any money upon the claim, or even proof that the claimant was the discoverer of the deposits.

I suppose even that language from the President whom he helped to the Presidential chair would not have influenced the Senator from Rhode Island, and, if I may accept his statement, it would not tend to influence any of the Senators whose opinions he seems to represent upon this floor.

But, Mr. President, after that measure had thus been vetoed by the President of the United States and the Fifty-first Congress had not passed it, it came back again in the Fifty-second Congress in another form. The proposition then, as I showed when I last took occasion to take the floor on this measure, was to set apart out of the Uncompahgre Ute Reservation the four townships of land in which those valuable bodies of gilsonite lie. The Committee on Indian Affairs investigated the subject and made a report on it, which I have put into the RECORD in the remarks which were made some weeks ago and in which I was interrupted. In the report the committee said, as the result of their investigation, that there were no discoverers who were entitled to claim those lands by reason of discovery, that there were no prospectors who were entitled to claim those lands by reason of priority of discovery, for the material lay open, on the surface of the ground, and was known to exist by those who had been there not in mineral pursuit, but in the ordinary way of traversing the country for gain or for other expeditions in which they might be engaged.

It was like discovering the existence of rock in the Alps or on the peaks of the Rocky Mountains. Everybody knew it was there who knew anything of it. It was not the product of research, of expenditure, of investigation. More than that, whatever claim was made by certain persons as prospectors was a claim in defiance of the law. Upon that subject I shall ask the attention of the Senate in a moment to some statements before the Senate from the Commissioner of Public Lands under General Harrison, who is an honored associate of ours upon this floor to-day.

Mr. President, when, as one of the subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs, this measure, in the Fifty-second Congress, was under my consideration I addressed an inquiry to the Secretary of the Interior in respect to the proposed bill and certain claims of alleged prospectors on these lodes of gilsonite, and I received the answers which I hold in my hand and which I will ask the Secretary to read. The first is from Mr. Commissioner Carter, of the General Land Office, and the second, based upon that in part, from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, Judge Chandler.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from the Hon. WILLIAM F. VILAS, United States Senate, which you referred to this office for report.

The Senator's letter relates to the White River, Kansas City, Joseph A. Thatcher, Scorpion, Lucky Boy, Leavenworth, Cow Boy, Dixie, Bandanna, Archie, Davy Crockett, Plumed Knight, Raffle, Black Jack, Wasatch, New York, Lorna Doone, Eureka, Colorow, Fryer Pan, Utah, Mary Mc, and Ouray lode claims, located in August, 1888, and said to bear "albertite or gilsonite."

From the description furnished, the exact geographical position of said claims can not be determined, nor can they be definitely located upon any map, plat, or diagram in this office. They are, however, in Uinta County, Utah, and within the Uncompahgre Ute Indian Reservation.

This reservation was established by Executive order dated January 4, 1892, under act of Congress approved June 15, 1880 (21 U. S. Stats., 199).

Although the land within this reservation is in a certain sense public land, yet in view of said act and order I am of the opinion that the attempt to locate the claims above mentioned under the mining-law laws was unwarranted and illegal.

Said attempted locations being, in my judgment, without any warrant in the law, I fail to see that these locators could acquire any rights, legal or equitable, as locators or discoverers by reason of such locations, or by reason of having notices thereof recorded in the office of the recorder of Uinta County, Utah.

I have been unable to find in any standard work on mineralogy any authority for designating any mineral substance as "gilsonite," but from information received I am led to think that that term has come into use as descriptive of a fine quality of asphaltum, dealt in by the Gilson Asphaltum Company, of St. Louis, Mo., with agencies in London and Hamburg.

In the Century Dictionary I find "albertite" to be defined as being a hydrocarbon, pitch-like in appearance, and related to asphaltum, but not so fusible nor so soluble in benzine or ether. It is used in the manufacture of illuminating gas and of illuminating and lubricating oils.

It might be held that public land valuable on account of its deposits of "albertite" would be subject to entry under the mineral land laws, but I am unable to refer you to any decision specifically in point.

The Senator's letter and inclosure are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

THOS. H. CARTER, Commissioner.

The Honorable SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 18, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of 30th ultimo, and accompanying printed copy of certain alleged notices of location of mining claims on the Cow Boy, etc., lodes of "gilsonite" within the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, and asking to be informed whether the notices of location if made would give the claimants or locators any right or claim under the laws of the United States, or any standing, equity, priority, or advantage as discoverers of or locators on the lands therein mentioned in the General Land Office or before the Interior Department or otherwise.

In response thereto, I transmit herewith copy of a communication of 18th instant, from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to whom the matter was referred, wherein the opinion is expressed that the attempt to locate the claims above mentioned under the mining-law laws was unwarranted and illegal, and he fails to see that these locators could acquire any rights, legal or equitable, as locators or discoverers by reason of such locations or by reason of having notices thereof recorded in the office of the recorder of Uinta County, Utah.

In this connection I invite your attention to the action taken by Congress in regard to the Uinta Reservation, where "gilsonite" was discovered in 1885, and I inclose for your information copy of House Report No. 791, Fifty-third Congress, first session, in relation to the matter.

By the act of May 24, 1886 (25 Stats., 157), certain lands of the Uinta Reservation said to contain "gilsonite" were restored to the public domain and preference was given by this act to the locator and the moneys derived from the sales of the lands belonged to the Indians. The act also required that it be ratified by the Indians.

The status of the Uncompahgre lands being different from that of the Uintas, being held in a reservation until allotted to and purchased by the Uncompahgres, the moneys from these lands if segregated would belong to the United States, and the consent of the Indians would not be necessary.

The inclosures of your letter are herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

GEO. CHANDLER,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM F. VILAS, United States Senate.

Mr. VILAS. Now, Mr. President, in addition to the fact which the Indian Affairs Committee reported to the Senate in the Fifty-second Congress, that there were no meritorious discoveries and that the alleged prospectors who had undertaken to set up stakes on a tract of land that was known to contain the mineral long before, I have now placed before the Senate the letters of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, showing that there was no such thing as a right to make those claims; that the law was explicit which denied to them any sort of privilege to enter upon that land; that they were entirely removed beyond the reach of prospectors, if prospecting had been possible. Among the papers which I have here—which I do not for the moment lay my hand upon, although I will presently find it, I hope, and call attention to it—is an affidavit of a person familiar with that land, who testifies to the fact that the line bounding the eastern border of the reservation and the western border of Colorado was plainly marked upon the ground and well known, and that there was no opportunity for any mistake to be alleged in respect to that subject.

I call attention to the fact that after the report was made, by which it was proposed to amend the bill so as simply to place these lands in the market for sale to the best bidder—a course which would afford to the United States all their value and to all persons interested or who desired to be interested an equal opportunity to share in the profits of their ownership—the bill was stopped. No effort was made to push it. Those who were interested in the proposition which was first introduced no longer manifested any desire to do but one thing, and that was to recall the action of the Committee on Indian Affairs and secure the withdrawal of the proposal which would put those lands to the benefit of the United States at large and their value in the Treasury instead of in private coffers.

I have here letters addressed to me, some of them printed. Here is one which was printed and circulated, signed by a gentleman who represented himself to be the attorney of that company whose ownership is in the city of St. Louis and which expected to be the beneficiary of the bill when it was passed. Perhaps it has already been said here, as it was then said, that the measure was to give the poor man a chance; that it was to open an opportunity to the explorer to go in there and enrich himself, perchance, if by lucky fortune fate lighted him upon some vein of valuable mineral. But, sir, it was drawn so as to give those alleged explorers (and that was the whole effort from beginning to end) the chance to perfect their claims; and although the St. Louis company represented itself or seemed to have agents to represent it to the committee and those interested as opposing these explorers, there was the best of evidence to believe that every one of the explorers was but the agent of the company. The Committee on Indian Affairs refused to change its views.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Wisconsin be kind enough to state that evidence?

Mr. VILAS. I will endeavor to call attention to it before we conclude the discussion. I had it collated, as I thought, ready to my hand, but I have come into the Senate finding this subject up unexpectedly, and I can not for the moment collate it. I hope to do it before I finish. I want to say that I have been ready from the first moment when this measure was proposed to discuss it at any time. When it came up first I was greatly surprised, and especially was I surprised to find that such a measure had ever gone through Congress as I have since learned went through on an appropriation bill. I learned it for the first time that morning. Yet I have never for an instant objected to the consideration of the measure. I debated it then, I went right on with the discussion, and the discussion was cut off only because the hour of 2 o'clock arrived. I have waited here hour after hour, day after day, and every Senator knows how absolutely necessary it is sometimes to be absent from this Chamber, how sure it is to be the fact that not one-half of the members of this body are present at any time except when there is a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution, by Mr. PEPPER, providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Wisconsin may have leave to conclude his remarks at this time, and that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. PEPPER. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana requests that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside while the Senator from Wisconsin finishes his remarks.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not wish, of course, to be discourteous to the Senator from Wisconsin, but I insist that we shall proceed with the regular business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senate to agree to take up the joint resolution the next day that the Senate is in session—to-morrow if in session; if not, then on Monday.

Mr. FAULKNER. I shall have to object to any unanimous-consent agreement extending beyond the moment when it is to be put into execution.

Mr. BROWN. I move that it be taken up on the next day's session, to-morrow or Monday—

Mr. HARRIS. That motion will not be in order.

Mr. BROWN. During the morning hour and after the morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion will not be in order now, other business being before the Senate.

Mr. TURPIE. I appeal to the Senator from Kansas to allow the honorable Senator from Wisconsin to conclude his remarks. That is in consonance with the wishes of the Senator who has the floor on the bond resolution. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin would not occupy much longer time.

Mr. PEPPER. The joint resolution has been put over by the arrival of the hour of 2 o'clock. The Senator from Wisconsin can finish his remarks at any time he desires to do so. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. VILAS. I am certainly obliged to my friend from Indiana, but I do not care to delay the regular order. I will be ready to go on to-morrow or Monday, if the Senate wants to take up the joint resolution then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the pleasure of the Senate to hear the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. Is the bond resolution before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. WALTHALL. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WALTHALL. I move that when the Senate adjourn today it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	McMillan,	Squire,
Allen,	Davis,	Martin,	Stewart,
Allison,	Dubois,	Mitchell, Wis.	Teller,
Bacon,	Faulkner,	Morrill,	Turpie,

Carter,	Harris,	Sewell,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Shoup,
Clark,	Hill,	Smith,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators are present. The roll call discloses the presence of a quorum. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CALL. Let us have the yeas and nays on that question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALL. I really think we ought not to adjourn over. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] made a speech this morning in regard to delay in the passage of the appropriation bills.

Mr. PEPPER. I hope the motion to adjourn over will be voted down, Mr. President.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to give notice that on Monday, at the earliest possible moment, I shall try to get up the Indian appropriation bill and continue its consideration until it is disposed of. I hope these other matters can be gotten out of the way before that time.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] and vote "yea."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. I suppose I ought to withhold my vote. I do not like to do it.

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). On this subject I am paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE]. The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who has not, I believe, voted. I therefore withdraw my vote. While on my feet I will state that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is unavoidably absent and is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HILL].

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President—

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to state that my pair with my colleague [Mr. ELKINS] was transferred to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], and my colleague's pair is transferred to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], so that the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Ohio will stand paired and my colleague is enabled to vote.

Mr. ELKINS. I vote "nay."

Mr. HILL (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] upon political questions. Everyone is voting as he pleases. To save all question I will transfer my pair to my colleague [Mr. MURPHY] and allow my vote to stand as before.

Mr. WALTHALL. I desire to announce that on this question the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—36.

So the motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. PEPPER February 12, 1896.

Mr. HILL. It has been so long since we have heard the resolution I desire to have the memory of the Senate jogged in regard to it, and therefore I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

Mr. PEPPER. Let it be read as it has been modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so read.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators shall be appointed by the Vice-President, whose duty it shall be—

First. To investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Second. To investigate and report specially what amount of available funds, classified, was in the United States Treasury and on deposit in other places subject to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury at the time the bonds were sold or offered for sale; whether there was or was not coin enough on hand to meet all coin obligations of the Government due at the time said bonds were sold or when they were offered for sale; what obligations were due at that time and the amount of each, stated separately; what was the reason for any unusual withdrawal of coin from the Treasury shortly before bonds were sold or offered for sale, if such unusual withdrawals were in fact made, and by what persons or classes of persons and for what purpose or on what account such withdrawals were made; who purchased the bonds, in what amounts and where, whether in the United States or in foreign countries, and in what proportions, and from what persons or classes of persons the gold was procured with which to pay for the bonds, what the bonds sold for, and what was the market price of our Government bonds at the time; and what effect the bond sales had on the credit and business of the people of the United States.

Third. To investigate and report as to the manner of disposing of said bonds, by what authority, and what contracts, advertisements, or proposals were made by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation thereto; what agreements or contracts, and whether oral or in writing, and whether publicly or privately, were entered into by the Secretary of the Treasury and any syndicate or person or persons with respect to the sale and purchase of the bonds and the profits made or to be made by such syndicate or any person or persons connected with such syndicate directly or indirectly; whether any officer of the Government, or any person or persons for such officer, and on his behalf, and in his personal interest, and with his knowledge or consent, entered into any contract, agreement, or arrangement, directly or indirectly, with any person or persons, partnership, corporation, company, or syndicate, for the purpose of affecting the price offered or to be offered for said bonds, or any of them, with the intent and expectation to receive commission or personal reward by reason of such contract, agreement, or arrangement; whether such contract or agreement had any and what effect on the prices offered for the bonds, what the effect was, and who, if any person, profited by it, and to what extent.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, before resuming the new features of my argument permit me to note briefly what may be regarded as already established in this discussion:

First. That this investigation is unnecessary.

Second. That it is pressed as a Populist resolution for political purposes only.

Third. That there is an absence of specific charges, which alone would warrant the institution of a solemn investigation.

Fourth. That the Senate has no jurisdiction to inquire into most of the matters embraced in the resolution, and could not enforce the attendance of witnesses or compel the giving of testimony in relation to such subjects.

Fifth. All the legitimate information desired can be otherwise obtained.

Sixth. The resolution is unnecessarily offensive in its terms, containing insinuations and reflections not warranted by anything charged from any responsible source.

Seventh. That the reasons urged for this investigation, as detailed in the speech of the author of the resolution, are wholly unsatisfactory, vague, indefinite, and many of them absolutely ridiculous and unfounded.

Eighth. That the whole basis of the proposed resolution is upon the allegation of the absence of legal power to issue any bonds whatever; purely a legal question, to be determined by judges and courts or judiciary committees, and not by mere investigating committees.

Ninth. If the Secretary of the Treasury has exceeded any authority for which there is no adequate remedy in the courts, then the remedy is by impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives and not by investigation or censure on the part of the Senate, whose members would be the judges and not the prosecutors in such a case.

Tenth. That it has been conclusively shown that the act of 1875 furnishes ample authority for the issuing of bonds to replenish the gold reserve.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from New York whether the act of 1875 confers any authority to procure gold or other coin for any other purpose than for the redemption of what are called greenbacks?

Mr. HILL. None; and that power never has been exercised for any other purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me further?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. When money is thus procured for the purpose of redeeming greenbacks can it be lawfully and properly used for the purpose of redeeming what are called Treasury notes under the act of 1890?

Mr. HILL. That is another question, Mr. President. The gold raised from the sale of gold bonds is used for the purpose of the redemption of greenbacks, and when the greenbacks are thus placed in the Treasury they can be used for any legitimate purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. The greenbacks may?

Mr. HILL. The greenbacks may.

Mr. President, as I stated in one of the points made, the whole basis of this investigation arises out of the allegation that there is no authority now existing to issue these bonds. I may be pardoned for quoting the act of 1875 in order that it may be placed in my remarks. I will ask the Secretary to read chapter 15 of the laws of 1875, an act for the resumption of specie payments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required, as rapidly as practicable, to cause to be coined at the mints of the United States silver coins of the denominations of 10, 25, and 50 cents, of standard value, and to issue them in redemption of an equal number and amount of fractional currency of similar denominations, or, at his discretion, he may issue such silver coins through the mints, the subtreasuries, public depositaries, and post-offices of the United States; and, upon such issue, he is hereby authorized and required to redeem an equal amount of such fractional currency until the whole amount of such fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

SEC. 2. That so much of section 3524 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as provides for a charge of one-fifth of 1 per cent for converting standard gold bullion into coin is hereby repealed, and hereafter no charge shall be made for that service.

SEC. 3. That section 5177 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, limiting the aggregate amount of circulating notes of national banking associations, be, and is hereby, repealed; and each existing banking association may increase its circulating notes in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and new banking associations may be organized in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and the provisions of law for the withdrawal and redistribution of national bank currency among the several States and Territories are hereby repealed. And whenever, and so often, as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association, so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000, to the amount of 80 per cent of the sum of national bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal-tender United States notes, and no more. And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption, at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled, "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid. And all provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Approved, January 14, 1875.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, it will be observed, upon analyzing this act of 1875, that it embraces a continuing authority, not limited in its exercise to a date prior to 1879, the date of specie resumption, but it is to be exercised whenever and so long as greenbacks are presented and coin shall be needed for redemption purposes. Bonds can be issued to procure either silver or gold coin as the Secretary of the Treasury may elect.

The theory of the friends of this resolution is that the authority embraced in the act of 1875 exhausted itself upon specie payments being resumed in 1879. There arose a question about this period of our history as to what redemption meant. It had ordinarily been supposed that redemption meant redemption in fact; that it meant payment; that it meant retirement; that it meant cancellation. If redemption had been conceded to mean that, then there would not have arisen the question which is presented to-day. Possibly at the time the law was passed it was not contemplated that its exercise would be necessarily continuous; but it will be recalled that subsequently the act of 1878 was passed, which required a continuous reissuing of greenbacks, and hence compelled a continuous redemption, and required an issue of bonds whenever the coin, gold or silver, was deemed necessary to replenish the redemption fund. In other words, this act of 1875, as construed with reference to the law of 1878, gave a continuous authority to protect the greenback currency and to redeem it so long as redemption should be required. The two acts must be construed together; and, sir, it is perfectly idle for lawyers to stand up in the Senate and say that the act of 1875 only applied to one single redemption, or that it at any time exhausted itself. Any other construction than that it was continuous would have stopped the wheels of Government, especially in the present deadlock, when the two Houses are divided upon the question of supplying additional revenue.

Mr. President, I commented yesterday upon the spectacle which would have been presented—upon the situation which would exist at this hour—if the President and Secretary of the Treasury had not exercised the power of issuing bonds with which to replenish the gold reserve. The bonds, while properly issued for the purposes of redemption only, have brought into the Treasury monies, greenbacks, available for current expenses, and thereby the Government has been kept afloat and its credit preserved. I need not remind the country of the chaos which would have resulted from any other course; I need not remind the country of the disasters which would have overtaken the Government if this power had not been exercised. Let me read the act approved May 31, 1878:

An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal tender notes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury or other officer under him to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal tender notes. And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation: Provided, That nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead, as now provided by law.

All acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.
Approved May 31, 1878.

Mr. President, the effect of that act was to provide for the continuous reissuing of greenback paper currency. Will it be said that this Government has provided a method by which greenbacks were to be continuously reissued, and at the same time had deprived that same Government of the power to protect and enforce that redemption? You can not redeem one greenback by another greenback. After the law was passed which pledged this Government to the redemption of its greenback currency in coin the Government must redeem its currency in coin or violate its sacred pledge. So when the Government provided that this greenback currency should be kept afloat, that it should be constantly reissued, it also understood that this act of 1875 gave a continuous power, whenever necessary, for the Government to issue its bonds. Sir, that has been its construction from that hour to this. Every Secretary of the Treasury has so argued, every financial officer of the Government has so understood it, every President of the United States who has since been in authority has so treated it in his messages. Who doubts it? As I said yesterday, a new-born party springs up, and that "combine" says that they have grave doubts of this authority. Why cast discredit upon the bonds of the country? Why attempt, in this critical hour, when the country's credit hangs in the balance, to insinuate and suggest a doubt where no doubt exists? I said yesterday that it would have been impossible to have kept up the credit of this Government except for the exercise of this power.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said recently in the Senate and elsewhere about the vast debt incurred by the issuing of bonds. We had to have the money for the support of the Government, and while the bonds were not issued to provide revenue for the support of the Government, incidentally they had that effect. I have already stated that when bonds are issued for the purpose of procuring gold, that gold is used for the purpose of the redemption of greenbacks; and the greenbacks when placed in the Treasury become funds of the Government, and can be used for the expenses of the Government or for any other legitimate purpose.

If we had not obtained money from the bonds there was no other source from which to obtain it except from additional revenue legislation. The Treasury might have been temporarily relieved by the coinage of some silver bullion, but it would have been a mere drop in the bucket. In a short time it would have been exhausted. Therefore I ask those who say—who say simply—that they doubt the authority of the Government to issue bonds, how would this Government have been continued in its operation during the past year except by the issuing of bonds?

As is well known, I did not support the Wilson bill. I tried to have some obnoxious provisions stricken from it. I used my influence to make it a conservative bill, yielding sufficient revenues. I doubted the wisdom of some of its extreme features, but nevertheless it was passed; passed by votes upon this side of the Chamber; passed as a great triumph of tariff reform. That act, as is conceded by its friends as well as its enemies, does not as yet produce an amount necessary for the ordinary expenses of the Government. It does not lie in the mouths of the friends of that measure now to object because funds are procured elsewhere to supply the deficiencies of revenue occasioned by that act. I wish it were otherwise. I wish that my party at that time had framed a bill so conservative, so fair, so reasonable that there would have been no question about a deficiency of revenue. But, sir, extreme counsels prevailed, as they are seeking to prevail here now.

I wish to protect the best interests of that party. It would have been better had extreme counsels not prevailed then. It would be better for our party if extreme counsels did not prevail now. Therefore, I say it does not lie in the mouths of the friends of the Wilson Act to object because bonds have been issued for legitimate purposes, namely, the redemption of greenbacks, and because, incidentally, those bonds have furnished sufficient money to support the Government. How else would the Government have been supported? What chaos would have resulted without it! What a spectacle would have been presented to the country and to its opponents! What a weapon we would have put into their hands if this Government had ceased operations because without enough money to support it! This very power, exercised under the act of 1875, properly, regularly, duly exercised, has been the means by which the Administration has floated the Government along. Any other course would make the failure of the Wilson Act more apparent and emphatic. We had to have some revenue. The House and Senate were deadlocked. How else was it to be procured to supply deficiencies? Not that anyone had proposed to issue bonds to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government; but as we had to have the gold with which to redeem the greenbacks, incidentally that very situation furnished us the revenue to meet the deficiency occasioned by the Wilson Act.

It is not necessary that I should explain to the Senate or to the country that the funds which are thus accumulated by the sale of bonds are not kept separate. They never have been since the act of 1875 was passed. There is no statute which requires it. When once the gold is used to redeem greenbacks and the greenbacks pass into the Treasury, they become funds available for any legitimate purpose. Therefore my party should not be so anxious to condemn the issuing of bonds. Whatever the other side may seek to do to place us in a false position, whatever the Republicans and the Populists combined may do, our party should at least defend the conceded authority which exists, defend the propriety of the action, defend its legality, because there can be no real question but that the President and Secretary have proceeded regularly and legally.

Mr. President, I know our opponents will say that some $362,000,000 of bonds have been issued during this Administration. There are worse things than the issuing of bonds. Not a dollar of the money derived from the sale of bonds has been squandered. Not a dollar of the money has been misapplied. It has been used legitimately and properly, first, for the redemption of greenbacks; secondly, the greenbacks have been used for the expenses of the Government. You would think from some of the arguments presented here that the money from bonds had been frittered away. You would think it had been squandered. You would think that this was a pure debt contracted, for which the Government has received no adequate recompense. If we had not used the money thus obtained from the bonds we would have had to have some sort of taxation upon the people. We would have had to resort to something, and if the two Houses of Congress were deadlocked politically, as they have been upon the revenue question, how else would you obtain the money? The Government would stop. Would that have been a nice situation for the friends of the Wilson Act to have contemplated?

All there is of this question can be summed up in a few words. It is a mere question of arithmetic. The moneys have not been taken from the pockets of the people. If there had been additional revenue legislation, some more money would have come from the people; that is all. We have had no such legislation, and therefore the money remains in the pockets of the people. Having to have some money, it has been borrowed. It is a mere question of interest, and the whole issuing of bonds has not wronged the people one iota or inflicted any burden upon them except the mere question of interest. What is the Government to do? Who proposes a remedy? Here are the other House proposing what they call a revenue bill. It comes to the Senate and is seized upon and strangled and kept here. It is not to be passed. Nobody expects it to be passed. What is to be done? How is the Government to be supported except as the Government needed gold to redeem greenbacks, and so incidentally from that source has received some money. That is all there is of the question.

I shall not take up the time of the Senate longer in further establishing the point, first, that the act of 1875 is a continuous authority; that it continues to exist and can be exercised so long as and whenever any greenback shall be presented for redemption, no matter how many years it may be; that it does not exhaust itself by a single exercise; that it applies to all the greenbacks reissued, because it has been held over and over again that reissued greenbacks have the same legal status as when they were first issued. We Democrats on this side of the Chamber are quarreling over immaterial things. Something had to be done, as the Government needed so much revenue, and we did not procure it by the Wilson Act. Then you had to procure it from some source, and I do not think it becomes us so flippantly to criticize the issuing of bonds.

What other course was open to your President? What other course was open to your Secretary of the Treasury? They did not make those laws. They inherited them from those who preceded them. They inherited them under a system of finance fastened upon them, with which they were environed and from which they could not escape. They had to take the laws as they found them. Why this carping criticism of our officials of the Government? Can we get votes from the other side by this course? What good will it do to pass the resolution? What object is to be accomplished by it? How will it help silver? How will it help the friends of the Democratic party? God knows we have troubles enough of our own without borrowing any.

Mr. President, who are the people who demanded this investigation? Democrats anywhere in the country? No. Democrats understand this question. Republicans in the main? No, I think not. Business men? No. The men who bought the bonds outside of the syndicate, who might be offended in some way? No, they are not. Are the representatives from the States largely interested in this question demanding this investigation? No. The demand for investigation is political in its character. I do not blame the Populists, through their distinguished leaders here, for stirring up this question if they can. That is politics. They want to make political capital if they can. But I think the people pretty thoroughly understand it.

I know there is some prejudice against the issuing of bonds. So far as I am concerned, during the coming campaign I shall go to the people and tell them the exact truth. I shall say to them: "I tried to get a bill which would give greater revenue. I did not support the Wilson bill, because I objected to many of its features, particularly one to which I need not now allude. I hoped it would produce sufficient revenue to support the Government. We are all somewhat disappointed that it has not. But there has no wrong been done. There is no hardship about it. We have not taken the money from the pockets of the people. We have left it there. We had to issue bonds to get gold. Even if we had more revenue it would not have solved the question, because the laws which our predecessors have passed are so arranged that revenues do not have to be paid in gold. You can pay them in silver, in greenbacks, or in any other lawful money, and therefore you would still need gold." I shall tell them frankly of the situation. There will be no difficulty in regard to it. If, however, we intend to insinuate that there is something wrong; if, because we do not like all the details of every transaction, we are to suggest irregularity; if we are to suggest wrong; if we are to suggest fraud; if we are to join with the other side in criticisms of the men whom we placed in power, we might as well dissolve the old Democratic organization and bid farewell to it forever.

Mr. ALLEN. It has gone.

Mr. HILL. No, sir; the old party has not gone. I correct the Senator from Nebraska. That party will live if it is true to itself. It will live, sir, to uphold its true principles, and I do not believe that the actions of a few misguided men can destroy it. There have been darker days than these, and yet the party has emerged to win great and glorious victories.

Only a few politicians want this investigation. They want to throw mud. They want to create the impression that a great scandal exists. They want to make political capital by a clamor, a noise, a tumult, a sensation. They are all who are asking for it. The business men, the men who own farms, the men who own stores, the men who own blocks of houses throughout the country, the man of wealth, and the poor man who owns his little homestead, are not clamoring for the investigation. They have read the messages of our President; they have read the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, and they have read some of the speeches here which have elucidated those questions, and I think, sir, they understand the real question involved.

Why do I take this view of the question? I do not intend to speak at length of the vast interests of the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. It is one-tenth of this Union in population; it is more. It has largely extended wealth. It is the great business center of the country. There is where the bonds are floated from all parts of the country. All the conceivable schemes hatched up in other States go to New York to float their bonds. Waterworks, chartered corporations of every kind, and political managers in campaigns go to the citizens of New York for relief. It is a State that has vast business interests, a State usually without prejudices, a State that welcomes business men to its bounds always and treats all courteously and fairly. What is the interest of New York in this question?

Of course I know that I was told here when the bond question was up that the whole country was anxious to get these bonds. You recollect the speeches that were made here. It was said that gold was stowed away in the old lady's stockings, in the boots, in the back cupboards; that farmers and mechanics and others had gold stowed away, and that they were all anxious to come in and bid if they were only given a chance. It was said: "Keep those bonds away from the miserable syndicate in the city of New York, and the people will take the bonds." That sounded very well for a while. Those who made those arguments supposed at that time that the Administration was going to deal with the syndicate. In fact, they said it was already arranged. I recollect denying it. I recollect that I said my understanding was that the Administration might or might not deal with any syndicate then formed or contemplated.

Finally, when on Monday morning after the famous debate of Thursday we read in the morning papers that the Secretary of the Treasury had concluded to have a popular loan, what was then said? Senators met here and congratulated one another and shook hands with one another. I overheard them say, "Well, we brought the Administration to terms. We smashed the syndicate. We made them issue a popular loan. They did not want to do it. They wanted to favor the syndicate, but we made them stop." I recollect that one Senator caused to be given to the newspapers an account of the large number of letters and telegrams he had received from various parts of the country congratulating him on his firm stand, and how he had brought the Administration to its knees by his little resolution that we debated here one afternoon. The public could not have known about all those letters and telegrams unless he had given them out.

I looked to see how the bonds were subscribed for. The total subscriptions to the recent loan were $351,026,515, of which New York subscribed the modest sum of $450,898,850. I thus speak of New York and its interests here as one of the reasons why I manifest interest in this question. I do not propose to have the bonds which my constituents purchased discredited by any such bogus, trumped-up resolution as this if I can prevent it. Massachusetts alone subscribed $42,891,630; Pennsylvania, $11,690,200; Ohio, $9,398,950; Illinois, $5,154,100; Maryland, $3,729,500; New Jersey, $3,305,200. Then Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Connecticut in all subscribed $6,897,250. Then come Texas, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Delaware, District of Columbia, Virginia, and West Virginia, all together, $5,200,635. Then comes another group of States, Nebraska, Missouri, Arkansas, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Kansas, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, and Wisconsin, $5,570,850. Then comes another group of States which were going to take all the bonds before they were issued at 2½ or 3 per cent—Arizona, California, Indian Territory, Montana, Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, and all others, $6,289,330. I give these figures to show the interest the people of my State have in this great financial question.

The real grievance of these agitators is not the mere issuance of bonds, because, as I stated, even if they are not necessary it is only a question of the loss of interest involved, but because silver is not forced upon the holders of greenbacks in redemption. That is the real grievance. They do not explain about how the Government is to be run by the pursuit of any other course. They say, "Coin the bullion in the Treasury; coin the seigniorage." That would be only a small amount, which would be soon exhausted. The grievance is really against the Secretary of the Treasury that he does not force the holders of greenbacks to accept silver.

This matter resolves itself into a mere question of option. Who shall have the option, the Government or the people who hold the bonds? Or, if the Government has reserved to itself the legal option, what, under all the circumstances, is the best policy to pursue? Shall it exercise the option, or shall it, in the pursuance of a wise and reasonable policy of keeping all of our different kinds of currency together upon a parity, allow the holder to have the option? That is the question. All else about this question is exaggeration; all else about it is misrepresentation; all else about it is reckless assertion. It is a question of policy, not of law; it is a question of policy, not of honesty; it is a question of policy, not of regularity or propriety. What I object to in the resolution is that instead of recognizing the difference between the friends of the gold standard and the friends of the silver standard, instead of recognizing that the difference between the two sides is a great question of public policy, not a question of law, our friends who are pressing the resolution insist upon making it a question of honesty, a question of law, a question of regularity. There is no such question.

Differ as we may with the Secretary of the Treasury upon these matters, this great question ought not to be diverted into a foolish, unwise, senseless, silly attack upon an Administration which will emerge therefrom, in my judgment, without a single stain put upon it, and to the discomfiture of those who vote for the resolution.

Why not take the other position, the manly position, the square position, that the gold policy requires this thing to be done; that all that has been done is that which had to be done under the gold policy? Why not recognize that fact and treat it fairly? Why not recognize the fact that if this Government insists upon preserving the single gold standard as it now exists in law it must necessarily when demanded pay its obligations in gold? Instead of trying to pass this offensive resolution to investigate the Secretary of the Treasury it would be better to concede that he had to issue the bonds to keep up the gold standard. Admit it, but do not question his honesty, do not question his integrity, do not question the law under which it is done. Sir, he has ample authority for all that has been done. Therefore the matter resolves itself into a question of a great public policy.

I have great respect for those who say that they believe it would have been wiser for the Government to have adopted the course of redeeming the greenbacks in silver. The friends of the gold standard say, "Would not that course ultimately drive gold out, as the cheaper metal usually drives out the dearer? Would it not result in putting a premium on gold?" They say as an answer, they do not believe it would. I do not question their good faith. I think that those who differ with me upon this great question honestly differ. I concede the honesty of their motive. I object, however, to their assailing those who differ with them.

Mr. President, there is some excuse, it is true, for what has been at times hastily said. I know that the words "sound money" are used by almost everyone. The words "honest money" are used, and the friends of silver are ready to believe that the friends of the single gold standard insist that they are the friends of dishonest money and unsound money. I always avoid the use of those terms where I can. They are in the public prints; you hear them in public discussions, and it is hard to avoid the use of them. I speak of the gold standard and of the silver standard, the single gold standard or the double standard. That is the proper way to speak of the different phases of this question.

Sir, I do not believe that any true friend of silver wants to foist upon the country any currency that is not equal to gold or will not prove to be. You recollect the last words that were uttered when the silver bill passed the Senate in January. I recall the language of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] when he said, "We expect by the free coinage of silver to make the silver dollar equal to the gold dollar. We expect that within a very short time (I think he said, however, immediately) when this law shall be passed that the silver dollar will soon be equal to the gold dollar." Sir, undoubtedly he believes it. That is the theory of those who honestly desire the double standard or desire to see silver recognized more than it is.

Yet, notwithstanding the unfair expressions of many of those who conduct the campaign in favor of the gold standard, notwithstanding silver men are unfairly, I think, sometimes taunted that they are in favor of an unsound currency and a dishonest currency, I want to call your attention to the fact that while they differ with the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury he does not offensively use those expressions. I have perused his speeches, and while once in a while, but rarely, such expressions are used, he argues the question fairly from his standpoint. I have seen no abuse of the silver men in his speeches. Sir, he is an able man. His speeches show most eloquent diction, and he shows his learning in every line of his public addresses. In his recent great speech at Chicago, no matter whether you differ from him or not, he presents his side of the case fairly, intelligently, without abuse of those who differ from him.

Mr. President, are the friends of silver in this Chamber upon either side to answer this great argument in favor of the single gold standard by the Secretary of the Treasury with an offensive resolution to investigate him, with insinuations of dishonesty right upon its face? No, Mr. President; I have too much confidence in the good friends here who believe in bimetallism, who believe in silver, who want honestly to do something in its behalf, to believe that they will countenance any such resolution here even at the dictation of the Populist party in the Senate.

The Secretary of the Treasury believes that the best policy for this Government to pursue is to allow the holder of securities to have the option as to the kind of money that the paper currency shall be redeemed in. I am inclined to think that in the financial situation which has confronted this country in the past few years that conclusion has been a wise one. I know not what would have been the result of some other policy. It might have worked well. We might have avoided danger. This is a great and growing and strong country, and it takes a great deal to ruin it. I can not see any other course ahead for this Government to pursue. Possibly if another course had been pursued, and silver had been forced upon the holders of securities, the country might have survived. I know not. It is not a time to make experiments.

What is the law? Whether the law is wise or unwise is not the question. You have to-day upon your statute books authority for the maintenance of only one single standard, and that is the gold standard. You may honestly seek to change it by an amendment of the statute; but while it exists is there any other course except honestly to enforce that policy and enforce that statute?

Mr. President, what are the complaints made upon which this investigation is desired? If it had been introduced by my distinguished friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] I would have said that he wanted to have some fun; that he did it as a joke; that he enjoys a fracas of this kind—an investigation; that he would like to have had the tumult which would arise in the newspapers in regard to it, and would like to see the Democratic officials squirm under this investigation. That is all very well from his standpoint; but, Mr. President, the people are not interested in those things. The great business interests of the country are not interested in the Congressional squabbles of one party obtaining a trifling advantage over another. The business interests of the country do not want Congressional investigations over grave financial questions if they can be avoided. There is nothing in it for them. They do not like this attempt to get mean, little, contemptible political advantage of one party over another by using the great weapon of a Congressional investigation, disturbing the financial affairs of the country.

The first two loans, of about $50,000,000 each, are to be investigated. That is what the resolution says. What was the trouble about those loans? What was the trouble about the first two loans? Oh, they say there was no authority. That is the whole difficulty. We have got over that. What was the difficulty in fact? The syndicate had nothing at first to do with those loans. A popular loan was started in one of them and failed; then subscriptions were started. Who questioned those first two loans, their regularity, their propriety? No one. We are going to investigate them. I suppose they thought the tail would go with the hide, and put them all in. If we are going to have a time, let us have a great time. I was going to use a stronger phrase, but I refrain from it. Therefore we are going to investigate the first two loans of $50,000,000 each just for the fun of the thing; that is all. Nobody makes any complaint; nobody has indicated any fraud; nobody has said there was any irregularity, but we are going to investigate them.

Now, the second is the syndicate loan of last February. What was there about the syndicate loan? I say, and I challenge successful contradiction, that in the making of that loan there was nothing done secretly. The gold reserve was rapidly diminishing; a crisis was at hand; time was important. Concede, if you please, that the terms were somewhat harsh; what of it? That is a mere question of negotiation. Unless you will dare to go to the extent of saying that the officers of our Government were recreant to their trust, the mere fact whether there was a little excessive percentage one way or the other makes no difference. It was a question of negotiation, a question of bargain, and if you concede that the parties to the contract were honest, there is really nothing further to investigate about it.

The author of the resolution, in his speech that I referred to yesterday, said the country was astonished. Mr. President, is that so? Will that bear investigation? Before the President, through his Secretary, had issued a single bond prior to the February loan he sent to this Congress a special message, which I will ask the Secretary to read, showing that he did nothing secretly, showing that he warned Congress of what was coming, showing that he appreciated the gravity of the situation, showing that he wanted to discharge his duty to his country. That message shows it.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Since my recent communication to the Congress, calling attention to our financial condition and suggesting legislation which I deemed essential to our national welfare and credit, the anxiety and apprehension then existing in business circles have continued.

As a precaution, therefore, against the failure of timely legislative aid through Congressional action, cautious preparations have been pending to employ to the best possible advantage, in default of better means, such executive authority as may, without additional legislation, be exercised for the purpose of reinforcing and maintaining in our Treasury an adequate and safe gold reserve.

In the judgment of those especially charged with this responsibility, the business situation is so critical and the legislative situation is so unpromising, with the omission thus far on the part of Congress to beneficially enlarge the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury in the premises, as to enjoin immediate Executive action with the facilities now at hand.

Therefore, in pursuance of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes, the details of an arrangement have this day been concluded with parties abundantly able to fulfill their undertaking whereby bonds of the United States, authorized under the act of July 14, 1875, payable in coin thirty years after their date, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, to the amount of a little less than $62,400,000, are to be issued for the purchase of gold coin amounting to a sum slightly in excess of $65,000,000, to be delivered to the Treasury of the United States, which sum, added to the gold now held in our reserve, will so restore such reserve as to make it amount to something more than $100,000,000. Such a premium is to be allowed to the Government upon the bonds as to fix the rate of interest upon the amount of gold realized at 3 per cent per annum. At least one-half of the gold to be obtained is to be supplied from abroad, which is a very important and favorable feature of the transaction.

The privilege is especially reserved to the Government to substitute at par within ten days from this date, in lieu of the 4 per cent coin bonds, other bonds in terms payable in gold and bearing only 3 per cent interest, if the issue of the same should in the meantime be authorized by the Congress.

The arrangement thus completed which, after careful inquiry, appears in present circumstances and considering all the objects desired to be the best attainable, develops such a difference in the estimation of investors between bonds made payable in coin and those specifically made payable in gold in favor of the latter as is represented by three-fourths of a cent in annual interest. In the agreement just concluded the annual saving in interest to the Government, if 3 per cent gold bonds should be substituted for 4 per cent coin bonds under the privilege reserved, would be $539,159, amounting in thirty years, or at the maturity of the coin bonds, to $16,174,770.

Of course there never should be a doubt in any quarter as to the redemption in gold of the bonds of the Government which are made payable in coin. Therefore the discrimination in the judgment of investors between our bond obligations payable in coin and those specifically made payable in gold is very significant. It is hardly necessary to suggest that whatever may be our views on the subject, the sentiments or preferences of those with whom we must negotiate in disposing of our bonds for gold are not subject to our dictation.

I have only to add that in my opinion the transaction herein detailed for the information of the Congress promises better results than the efforts previously made in the direction of effectively adding to our gold reserve through the sale of bonds; and I believe it will tend, as far as such action can, in present circumstances, to meet the determination expressed in the law repealing the silver purchasing clause of the act of July 14, 1890, and that, in the language of such repealing act, the arrangement made will aid our efforts to "insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts."

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
February 8, 1895.

Mr. HILL. This special message was an able and comprehensive statement of the then existing financial situation. It informed Congress of exactly what was contemplated and what would have to be done. If those who were so jealous of syndicates, if those who in this Chamber so frequently denounce syndicates desired to deprive those syndicates of the bonds which were to be issued, they had ample authority so to do. The President asked for legislation which would give him the right to have bonds issued at 3 per cent and better terms for the Government secured. It is true that he asked for gold bonds. It is true he argues that gold was needed for the purposes of replenishing the redemption fund. But, Mr. President, Congress was deaf to his appeal. Congress refused any sort of legislation upon the subject. Congress seemed to prefer to denounce syndicates in public speeches and play into their hands by refusing adequate legislation.

The President of the United States informed Congress precisely what he had felt constrained to do. In considering the syndicate contract we should not forget the fact that under the very terms of that contract one-half of the gold was to be supplied from abroad. Need I argue before the Senate or the country the value of that provision? Had we not seen under the system of popular loans nearly three-quarters of all the gold taken directly from the Treasury? That had been the practical result. The parties who desired bonds procured the greenbacks, went to the Treasury, drew out the gold, then came back and bought the bonds, and there was no possible way of stopping it, at least no feasible, no practical way.

But the value of this contract was that it provided that half of the gold should be obtained abroad, therefore leaving our gold intact in the Treasury of the United States. If Congress did not like that arrangement it could have changed it. If Congress wanted something better for the interests of the country, Congress could have legislated. Mr. President, legislation was not given. Congress largely accepted the responsibility and relieved the President. He had only to proceed under existing law; and while this syndicate contract of February, 1895, has been criticised I have never yet heard the able argument upon that side of the question presented by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] answered here or elsewhere.

The President in his subsequent annual message did not seek to escape the responsibility for what had been done. In his annual message that followed he detailed this transaction. He defended it. He accepted his share of the responsibility for it. He said that he believed he had subserved the best interests of the country, and he thinks so still. I will ask the Secretary to commence where I have marked on page 18 of the President's last annual message. It will be good matter to insert in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

The compulsory purchase and coinage of silver by the Government, unchecked and unregulated by business conditions and heedless of our currency needs, which for more than fifteen years diluted our circulating medium, undermined confidence abroad in our financial ability, and at last culminated in distress and panic at home, has been recently stopped by the repeal of the laws which forced this reckless scheme upon the country.

The things thus accomplished, notwithstanding their extreme importance and beneficent effects, fall far short of curing the monetary evils from which we suffer as a result of long indulgence in ill-advised financial expedients.

The currency denominated United States notes and commonly known as greenbacks was issued in large volume during the late civil war, and was intended originally to meet the exigencies of that period. It will be seen by a reference to the debates in Congress at the time the laws were passed authorizing the issue of these notes that their advocates declared they were intended for only temporary use and to meet the emergency of war. In almost if not all the laws relating to them some provision was made contemplating their voluntary or compulsory retirement. A large quantity of them, however, were kept on foot and mingled with the currency of the country, so that at the close of the year 1874 they amounted to $331,999,073.

Immediately after that date, and in January, 1875, a law was passed providing for the resumption of specie payments, by which the Secretary of the Treasury was required, whenever additional circulation was issued to national banks, to retire United States notes equal in amount to 80 per cent of such additional national bank circulation until such notes were reduced to $300,000,000. This law further provided that on and after the 1st day of January, 1879, the United States notes then outstanding should be redeemed in coin, and in order to provide and prepare for such redemption the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized not only to use any surplus revenues of the Government, but to issue bonds of the United States and dispose of them for coin, and to use the proceeds for the purposes contemplated by the statute.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I now yield for a little while to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], who wishes to present a report.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. GEAR. I am directed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads to report a new bill as a substitute for Senate bills 773, 798, and 1369. I will state that I shall file the report of the committee favoring the passage of the bill within a day or two.

I wish to state further in this connection that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] dissents in some degree from the report regarding the Union Pacific Railroad, and reserves the right, which the committee cheerfully accord him, of filing, if he wishes, a minority report.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the titles of the bills be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The titles of the bills will be stated. The new bill reported by the Senator from Iowa will be placed upon the Calendar and the other bills indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

A bill (S. 1369) directing the foreclosure of the Government lien on the Pacific railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLEN. By whom was that bill introduced?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. I want that bill to go upon the Calendar, Mr. President, and not to be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. GEAR. The committee does not ask for the indefinite postponement of the various bills for which it reports the substitute. It presents a new bill as a substitute in lieu of all of the other bills. Of course it will be for the Senate to take what action it pleases regarding any of the bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The titles of the other bills will now be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

A bill (S. 773) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864; and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and to provide for a settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain of the railroads, and to secure to the United States payment of all indebtedness of certain of the companies therein mentioned—introduced by Mr. FRYE.

A bill (S. 798) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved May 7, 1878, in amendment of said acts—introduced by Mr. THURSTON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. GEAR. Now, let the Secretary read the title of the bill which was reported by the committee as a substitute for the bills the titles of which have just been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill referred to will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

The bill (S. 294) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act, and other acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto; and to provide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLEN. With the consent of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if this is what is known as the Frye bill?

Mr. GEAR. No, sir; it is the committee bill. It is somewhat changed from the Frye bill. It is the bill prepared by the committee, which embraces the settlement of both roads.

Mr. ALLEN. I infer that the Committee on Pacific Railroads has concluded its examination of witnesses.

Mr. GEAR. I think so.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator if any of the shippers along the line of these bond-aided railroads have been invited to appear before the committee?

Mr. GEAR. As I stated once before to the Senator from Nebraska when this question was before the Senate, public notice has been given of all the hearings, and shippers, boards of trade, and everybody else could have appeared before the committee and have stated whatever they chose.

Mr. ALLEN. No further notice has been given?

Mr. GEAR. No further notice has been given.

Mr. ALLEN. Simply a general notice?

Mr. GEAR. Simply a general notice, the same notice as has been given of all the hearings by committees in both branches of Congress during my service in either branch.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator also whether any specific invitation has been extended to any boards of trade or chambers of commerce or grangers or Alliance organizations to furnish data and appear before the committee?

Mr. GEAR. No specific invitation has been sent to anybody.

Mr. ALLEN. What class of witnesses have appeared here, and representing what interests?

Mr. GEAR. I have not time to recapitulate all the evidence. It fills a large book. The Senator can get it by application to my committee room, and find out what class of persons came before the committee and read it, which I suppose he will do.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I can read.

Mr. GEAR. I know you can.

Mr. ALLEN. I simply desire to say a few words, if I can have the permission of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, several weeks ago this question was up, and it was then notorious that Collis P. Huntington and his lobbyists—because that is the proper designation for them—were here in force to influence the action of Congress in legislation upon the subject of the Pacific railroads. I then called the attention of my honorable friend from Iowa, for whom I have the highest respect, to the fact that no invitation had been sent to the patrons of these roads and to the people who were affected by this legislation, either to appear before the committee or to lay before it any data in their possession. I had hoped at that time that the honorable Senator from Iowa, who is at the head of this committee, would have sent out an invitation which could have been done for 2 cents—a 2-cent postage stamp would have carried the letter—to the National Grange and the national and State alliances of the States through which these railroads run, and the boards of trade, the chambers of commerce, and the great body of shippers and people whose interests are affected—and deeply affected—by this proposed legislation, to appear before that committee and give evidence and furnish data. I supposed, of course, that the honorable Senator would have done that. I had no doubt that he would do it when his attention was drawn to the fact. I regret to say, Mr. President, that it does appear to me as though there had been a studied effort on the part of the Pacific Railroads Committee to cut off those people from any opportunity to appear before the committee or lay before it necessary evidence and data, and by that means get a full, free, and fair expression of popular sentiment upon the subject.

Mr. GEAR. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will permit me for a moment, I beg to say, in reply to the statements made by the Senator from Nebraska, whom I have known these many years in all the different political affiliations and parties with which he has been connected during the last thirty years, that, as I said before, a public notice was given that the committee were to have hearings in regard to a proposed settlement on the part of the Central and Union Pacific railroads of the debts they owed the Government. The only notice, as I have before said, that I have ever known to be given by a committee of Congress in regard to a proceeding of this kind went out in the Associated Press dispatches. The hearings were reported and published from the Golden Gate to the Atlantic Ocean. Every day the papers of California and of Omaha, in the Senator's own State, had full reports of what the committee were doing, and everybody who felt inclined to appear, or who had anything to say to the committee, had a perfect opportunity to do so. The doors of the committee have always swung inward—

Mr. PEPPER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. GEAR. I will be through in a minute, if the Senator will allow me.

The doors of the committee have always swung inward for every man, for every woman—because women have been before the committee, I believe—to appear before the committee to make their statements. If the National Grange or the National Farmers' Alliance or the boards of trade of Omaha or of any other place along the line from here to the Pacific Ocean wanted to come before the committee, they had the opportunity. The committee were not empowered to send for persons and papers, and therefore the only notice they could give was the same as that which has always been given in the other branch and in this branch of Congress when hearings have been had in regard to the great question of the tariff. If individual notices had been sent out, it would have taken months to close up the hearings.

The members of the committee can answer each individually to the charge which the Senator from Nebraska makes in regard to this matter. They are perfectly competent to do it. They are able men, in my judgment, and as honorable as any who are on the floor of this Senate, and they have given a great deal of time and attention to this vexed question. Whether they have arrived at the proper solution of the subject in the bill reported, time will show. The votes of Senators, when the bill is presented to them, will show whether they think the committee is right or wrong.

The Senator has no right to come in and impugn the committee, or the chairman of the committee, by saying they have not done their duty in not sending out written notices to Tom, Dick, and Harry all over God's creation to come and appear before the committee. In my judgment, the Senator would not have done it if he were chairman of that or any other committee.

That is all I wish to say, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Kansas, I wish to occupy the time of the Senate for just a moment.

I am not inclined to engage in a quarrel with my distinguished friend from Iowa, for whom I have very great respect indeed—

Mr. GEAR. You can not get into a quarrel with me.

Mr. ALLEN. For I have known him since I was a barefooted boy. I believe him to be an honest man and I know him to be an able man, but I can not understand, and the Senator will have to explain his explanation to me before I can understand—it may be in consequence of my dullness—why the people of this country have no right, why they have not been invited, to appear before this committee and make their grievances known.

I speak of what I have seen with my own eyes. I have been in the Pacific Railroads Committee room on two different occasions when this so-called investigation was going on, and I have seen that supreme magnate of American railroads and American politics, himself the embodiment of force and corruption, Collis P. Huntington, sitting there, apparently a lord over the committee and everybody around him, and his lobbyists occupying the seats in the committee room; not a farmer, not a merchant, not a man living upon the prairies, not a man living along the line of the railroads there—not one.

The Senator from Iowa says that it has not been the custom to send out notices to these people. Mr. President, if it has not, then the custom ought to be changed. A precedent that excludes the great masses of the people who are affected by legislation of this kind from an opportunity to be heard before this committee, or any other committee of Congress, ought to be revoked as speedily as possible.

I am not going to make any charge against the committee—I would not do that, for I recognize that they are all honorable gentlemen; Brutus was an honorable man also. I recognize their honesty and their capacity, but I can not help but be impressed with the thought that there was a studied and a fixed purpose—and I say it now—a studied and fixed purpose to exclude these people from any representation before that committee or an opportunity to lay before it their wishes or any facts in their possession.

This bill—I do not know what it is, but if it is read, and I shall ask to have it read and put in the RECORD, so that it shall appear to-morrow morning—means what? I can read it as well as though I had it before my eyes at this moment. It means an extension of the debt of these railroads to the nation substantially upon the lines laid down and dictated by Mr. Huntington. That is all I now desire to say.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—

Mr. GEAR. One moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks this colloquy is entirely out of order and proceeds with the permission of the Senator from New York.

Mr. GEAR. I understand it is by the grace of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator from Nebraska claims to represent on this floor the great State of Nebraska. I will not say that he misrepresents it. I will leave that to his people to say. Why did not the Senator from Nebraska come before that committee himself? That is a question for him to answer. He is supposed to represent the great farming interests, the grange interests, the national alliances, and the boards of trade. He says we did not give them notice, and he, representing them as the fiduciary agent of those interests, failed to come in person. He knew this committee was sitting day by day, and for weeks and months.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me correct the Senator. That statement ought not to be made.

Mr. GEAR. What statement?

Mr. ALLEN. The statement the Senator is now making.

Mr. GEAR. Why not?

Mr. ALLEN. I stood at my desk here two months ago and called your attention to this matter.

Mr. GEAR. I ask you here now, did you not know, and do you not know as a matter of fact, that this committee was in daily session examining people under oath? Had you not a right, as every other man in the Senate, every Senator, every citizen of this country, to come before that committee and make any statement you wished?

It is a great deal easier, Mr. President, to pull down than it is to build up. The Senator is of that class of people who try to pull down and not to build up the legislation of the country.

I will state briefly what the bill contains. The original debt of the Pacific railroad companies to the United States is paid and the money is in the Treasury of the United States. This bill simply deals with the interest. Whether the matter is dealt with in the best manner is for the Senate to decide. The bill provides for certain payments, $1,000 a day for the first ten years, $1,500 a day for the next ten years, and $2,000 a day thereafter until final payment. And also the payment of some annual interest. Whether the committee in this bill have devised the best method of making and adjusting the settlement I do not know. I do not claim for the committee infallibility; but I do claim that the members of that committee are men of as high standing as there are in this Senate, and it is in very bad taste for the Senator from Nebraska to come in here and impugn the integrity and the reliability of his brother Senators because they have not come up to what he thinks is perfection. I for one do not propose to stand here and take the kind of language that the Senator from Nebraska addresses to me. He can get no quarrel with me. I know him well. I have known him probably longer and better than many other Senators in this Chamber. I know the kind of parties he has affiliated with for the last thirty or forty years. Now he turns up with the party which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] calls "Populites." It is much easier for that class of men to tear down than to build up. The Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives are endeavoring to build up, in my judgment, and save the Government the money due it. Whether the committee have done wisely will be found out when the bill is brought to the Senator's notice and he has an opportunity to discuss it and vote upon it.

Mr. ALLEN. Just a word, and I shall not interrupt the exhibition of my friend from New York much further.

Mr. HILL. What?

Mr. ALLEN. His speech, I should say. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Iowa, I regret to say, loses his temper. I have not impugned the motives of the honorable Senator from Iowa nor his associates on the Pacific Railroads Committee. Whatever I might think about that, Mr. President, I would not give expression to it here. I might say, however, that I have no disposition to impugn his motives or the motives of his associates. I would not suffer myself to do that.

The Senator, however, seems to make, or undertakes to make, a point upon me that I have not followed this Pacific Railroads Committee around to its committee room. It is not my duty to do so. I was sent here to represent in part the State of Nebraska. I did not come here by the consent of the Senator from Iowa, and never should have come here by his consent.

Mr. GEAR. That is true.

Mr. ALLEN. That is true. I am here in spite of him, Mr. President, and I am going to stay here, too, for a while, and whenever I think a thing is wrong I am going to say so, it does not make any difference who is involved, and I am not going to say it with any insinuation attached to it. If I think anything involves the character of the Senator from Iowa I will say so to him in plain Anglo-Saxon. He never in the world will be mistaken as to what I mean.

Mr. GEAR. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. GEAR. When this question was up some six weeks ago, the Senator will bear in mind that I then invited him to come before the committee. Why did he not come? Please answer that question to the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I am just answering it, and I will answer it completely.

Mr. GEAR. I shall be glad to have you do it.

Mr. ALLEN. It is not my business to go before that committee; not at all. I am here to point out to the Senator from Iowa the fact that along the line of these railroads there are great organizations of farmers and merchants and consumers and shippers who have a great deal of valuable data that ought to be laid before the committee. I did that from my desk in the Senate in as dignified a way as I am capable of transacting business. It was then the duty of the Senator from Iowa, in my judgment, to send out an invitation to those people to lay their data before the committee, and not to engage for six or eight weeks in a special exhibition given for Collis P. Huntington and his peculiar class of people to the exclusion of the honest granger and the merchant and the shipper and the consumer. I did call attention to that fact.

Now, let me speak of one more thing. The honorable Senator from Iowa, who is a most excellent gentleman, says that he knows me well; he does; that he knows of my various political attachments and affiliations. I beg to inform the Senate and the country now all about them, and I will inform the Senator from Iowa of something he does not know.

I cast my first vote for Abraham Lincoln for President of the United States. I was in the Army at the time, I suppose not a voter, although I was told by the commissioners who took the vote that I was, and I voted. I cast my second vote for U. S. Grant for President of the United States.

Mr. GEAR. I congratulate the Senator on twice having voted right. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. I cast my next vote again for Grant in 1872. I suppose the Senator will congratulate me there.

Mr. GEAR. I will.

Mr. ALLEN. I cast my next vote for Samuel J. Tilden in 1876.

Mr. HILL. I congratulate the Senator there. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Thank you.

In 1880, Mr. President, I cast my next vote for James A. Garfield for President. In 1884 I was absent from my State at the time the election was held. If I had been there I should have voted for James G. Blaine. I believed him to be a very great statesman; and I believe also, and believed at the time, and I have never had occasion to change my mind, that Samuel J. Tilden was one of the greatest statesmen and purest men this country has ever produced.

In 1888, I regret to say, Mr. President, I cast my vote for the late President of the United States, Benjamin Harrison. In 1892 I cast my vote for James B. Weaver, thank God! [Laughter.]

Now, I have told the Senator from Iowa something that he never knew before. The Senator was simply fishing in the dark when he said he knew my political affiliations.

Mr. President, when a man lives to be 75 or 80 years of age and never discovers that he has been in error there is no hope for that man; none whatever. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I understand that the test of a man's knowledge is that he must change his politics once in a while. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, no, Mr. President; not at all; but that man who puts his party above his country is the most dangerous enemy the country can have. What is a political party designed for but as a means to produce the end of good government? Whenever a man says that his patriotism is measured and limited by the hidebound decrees of a political party, and can never see that it is in error, there is no hope for that man, and there is no hope for a country the great body of whose citizenship is composed of that class of men.

Now I yield the floor to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, certainly the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is competent to speak on the subject of parties, because he has consecutively belonged to them all, and seemed to me to intimate toward the last that he was meditating another change. [Laughter.]

The Senator will also notice that he has been obstructing the passage of the resolution of his Populist friend from Kansas [Mr. PEFER], which we are all so desirous to have passed, and have been waiting here anxious to pass as soon the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] shall exhaust himself. [Laughter.] Yet the Senator from Nebraska has intervened with the discussion of the Pacific railroads question upon the formal presentation of the report by the chairman of the committee.

I desired to rise a few moments ago simply to say a word—an unnecessary word, it is true—in vindication of that committee from the aspersions (I must call them such) of the Senator from Nebraska. As I understood the Senator, he said that Mr. Huntington and his lobbyists had been allowed to lord it over that committee. He meant, if he meant anything, that Mr. Huntington and his associates dominated the committee—influenced it improperly in the manner of its investigation.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not in the result—

Mr. ALLEN. Let me correct the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not in the result, but in the manner of conducting its investigation.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me correct the Senator. We are all really helping the Senator from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from New York will excuse us both.

Mr. ALLEN. I neither said nor implied what the Senator from New Hampshire has stated.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is what the language means as it stands in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLEN. What I wanted to be understood as saying—and I ordinarily speak with plainness—was that every chair in the room of the Pacific Railroads Committee was occupied by Mr. Huntington and his friends except those occupied by the committee. They were there to the exclusion of other people.

Mr. CHANDLER. I undertake to say that the remarks of the Senator will read as an aspersion upon the committee, although they have been well replied to by the chairman of the committee. And the Senator now adds another aspersion. He can not mean anything but an aspersion when he says that all the chairs except those of the committee were occupied by Mr. Huntington and his friends. He implies by that that others who wanted to be there were excluded from chairs and had not a fair opportunity before the committee.

I do not speak now of the result which the committee has reached, but I undertake to say, so far as the investigation of the committee and its conduct of that investigation are concerned, that they are beyond criticism. It is absurd for the Senator from Nebraska to say that the committee should have advertised all over this country for people to come in and make objections. The whole country that is interested in this question knew that the bills were before the committee. The country has known it for years, and anyone who had the least desire to be heard had notice and an opportunity to be heard. If advertising was needed, the Senator from Nebraska had advertised over and over again in speeches in the Senate that the question was pending and that everybody who had anything to say ought to be there.

Mr. STEWART. The proceedings of the committee were published from time to time.

Mr. CHANDLER. The proceedings of the committee, as we all have noticed, have been reported in the papers. I did not enter the committee room, but we have read from time to time reports of the proceedings of the committee. The time was taken up literally by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is not in favor of the settlement bill, I suppose. If there has been any favoritism shown anywhere in the hearings, according to my observation it has not been to Mr. Huntington and his associates, or his lobbyists, or whatever else the Senator may call them, but the time was taken up by the opponents of the settlement, by the enemies of Mr. Huntington, and by the men who entertain the same views on the subject of this settlement that are entertained by the Senator from Nebraska. I say that vastly more of the time of the committee in the consideration of the business before it was taken up by the opponents of the settlement than by Mr. Huntington and the friends of the settlement. I call upon the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], who appears at my left, to dispute me if I am not correct.

Mr. STEWART. Three-quarters of the time was so employed.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nevada says three-quarters of the time. Here are the members of the committee: Mr. GEAR (the chairman), Mr. STEWART, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. FRYE, Mr. BRICE, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. FAULKNER, and Mr. MURPHY. The committee may have reached a mistaken result; it may have reported a bill that we shall not vote for, but I do deprecate in all sincerity the attack which the Senator from Nebraska has made upon the committee. Is he aware how much he creates sentiments of suspicion of the Populist party when he intimates that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], his distinguished associate in that party, could be actuated by any other than the best of motives in the performance of a public duty? It seems to me that the Senator should have refrained from criticising the mode and manner of the committee and should have withheld his obijuration until the bill came up for consideration.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me for a moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I am inclined to think that the allegations of the Senator from Nebraska present good ground for another investigation. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. I only hope that in order to prove that the Senator from New York is right he will not undertake to read all of the proceedings of the Pacific Railroad Committee as a part of his brief remarks.

Mr. HILL. I would not want to promise.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is all I have to say. I did not need to rise, but I think the Senator from Nebraska himself ought to disclaim in the most emphatic manner the idea which it seems to me he intended to convey—that Mr. Huntington and his lobbyists exercised an improper influence upon the conduct and action of the committee.

Mr. PEPPER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. GEAR. I ask the Senator from Kansas to give way for one moment.

Mr. PEPPER. I object to any further discussion.

Mr. GEAR. I ask the Senator from Kansas to give way for barely one moment.

Mr. PEPPER. I have given way for two or three moments already.

Mr. HILL. I have the floor.

Mr. GEAR. Then I ask the Senator from New York to yield to me.

Mr. HILL. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GEAR. I understand I am recognized. I wish to say one word more in regard to the hearings before the committee.

Of course the Central and the Union Pacific railroads were to make certain propositions to the Government in adjustment of this debt. The distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] requested Mr. Huntington to come before the committee. Fully 90 per cent of the time of the committee in the hearing of Mr. Huntington was taken up by the cross-questioning of the distinguished Senator from Alabama. The other Union Pacific representatives came there in their turn to make propositions to the Government through the committee. The only method by which they could come before Congress was through the committee. They came there and made their proposition, and were put under oath. The gentlemen who represent the Government, in the persons of Mr. Ellery Anderson and Mr. Oliver Mink, receivers for the Government, were also there, and they were put under oath. The hearing took up a long time, a large portion of which was taken up by my friend the Senator from Alabama, who, I regret, is sick and not able to be here. That is the history of the hearings.

The room of the committee, of which I have the honor to be chairman, is too small to accommodate the crowd that came to the hearing. Gentlemen from all over the country were there, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], chairman of the Committee on Commerce, kindly gave us his room in which to hold the hearing, so that we might accommodate the crowd of 20 or 30 or 50 people who came there. So it seems to me everybody had a right to come and that everybody came who wished.

The Senator from Nebraska has given us his political history. I congratulate him that out of seven Presidential votes he has given four or five at least on the right side. When he voted for James B. Weaver—a gentleman of my own State—he voted for a man who is in favor of confiscating all the railway property and public property, the telegraphs, and everything of that kind and issuing irredeemable paper money for them; who stood then and stands now on the same platform that the Senator from Nebraska stands on—the Ocala platform. The Senator from Nebraska has been a Republican. All right. He has been a Democrat, he says. I respect a good, honest Democrat. To-day he represents the Populist party, occupying a position between the two parties, according to his way, but really with his guns aimed toward the Republican party and looking all the time to the Democratic party, with which he affiliates. That is his political record.

Mr. ALLEN. With the consent of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], who is entitled to the floor—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is assuming also that the Senator from Kansas consents.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

Mr. HILL. I do not see that the Senator from Kansas has anything to do with it.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator from Kansas has the right at any time to raise a question of order, and that is all he has done.

Mr. HILL. There is nothing in the question of order. That is the difficulty.

Mr. ALLEN. If Senators will yield to me for just a moment, in the first place I desire to make a request that the bill as reported by my always amiable friend the Senator from Iowa may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GEAR. I hope the bill will be printed in the RECORD as the Senator requests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 2894) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act and other acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and to provide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain the amounts of the respective indebtedness of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Kansas Pacific Railway Company to which the subsidy bonds of the United States were advanced in aid of the construction of the Pacific railroads and branches, as of the 1st day of January, 1897, upon the same principle as if the whole sum of said bonds and interest paid and to be paid by the United States thereon, and not theretofore repaid by credits on account thereof, were to be paid to the United States in cash on said day; and the said sum shall be computed and ascertained as follows:

First. To the whole of the principal of said subsidy bonds attributable to each of said companies shall be added the interest paid or to be paid by the United States upon the same, so as to ascertain the total amounts that would have been due the United States for principal and interest paid on the bonds issued to each of said companies at their maturity if no payments or reimbursements had been made thereon by the companies.

Second. From said amounts so ascertained shall be deducted any payments or reimbursements made by or on behalf of either of said companies upon their indebtedness at any time before the 1st day of January, 1897, as shall appear in the bond and interest accounts of the said companies, respectively, with the United States.

Third. Compute the present worths of the amounts so found as of the 1st day of January, 1897, on the basis that money is worth 2 per cent per annum during the period between the date of average maturity of the said bonds and the 1st day of January, 1897. From the sums so ascertained there shall be deducted the amounts in the sinking fund applicable to the said companies, respectively, computing the value of any bonds in the said sinking fund at their market value at the time of such computation, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury; and said sinking fund shall thereupon be applied as a payment upon the debt of such company to the United States. The aggregate amounts so arrived at shall be deemed the sums that would be required to be paid on the said 1st day of January, 1897, by said companies for the purpose of completely discharging their entire debts to the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Union Pacific Railway Company, successor to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, be, and it is hereby, authorized to make, issue, and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to receive the same, its certain indenture of mortgage, which shall bear date the 1st day of January, 1897, covering and embracing all the lines of railway, rights of way, terminals, terminal properties, bridges, rolling stock, lines of telegraph, and all the then unsold land grant and other lands, and all the then outstanding land and town-lot contracts, and all property appurtenant thereto embraced in and covered by existing mortgages of the Union Pacific Railway Company, including all its unsubsidized as well as subsidized lines of railway and the branches and spurs connected therewith now owned by the Union Pacific Railway Company, the main lines whereof extend from Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, to a point about 5 miles west of Ogden, in the State of Utah, and from Kansas City, in the State of Missouri, to Denver, in the State of Colorado, and from Denver to Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, and from Leavenworth to Lawrence, in the State of Kansas, together with all appurtenances thereto belonging, and all rights, franchises, and privileges owned by the Union Pacific Railway Company in connection therewith or with the operation thereof. Said mortgage shall constitute a lien upon said properties junior and subject only to the new first mortgage hereinafter provided for, and shall cover and embrace all the lines of railway, property, franchises, and rights embraced in and covered by the said first mortgage. A proper and complete description and inventory of all the property affected by such mortgage shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, which, when approved by him, shall be filed in his office; and such mortgage on the property therein described shall be held as security for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds issued thereunder and authorized by this act; but this section or such mortgage shall not be construed to prevent the said company from using or disposing of any of its property or assets, in the ordinary, proper, and lawful course of its current business, in good faith and for valuable consideration, and said company may sell and convey for valuable consideration any lands included in its land grant and apply the proceeds thereof as required by the provisions of the new first mortgage hereinafter provided for: Provided, That every such disposition of any stocks, bonds, securities, or other property owned by said company, whether by sale, pledge, or otherwise, shall be reported to the Secretary of the Treasury within thirty days after such disposition has been made, and that the bonds, stocks, obligations, or other property acquired, with the proceeds of the property so disposed of, shall, except as hereinbefore provided, in like manner and with the same power to dispose of the same, be subject to the lien of the said mortgage, and that true and proper descriptions and lists of the same shall be from time to time prepared and filed with the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That the said Union Pacific Railway Company is hereby authorized to make, execute, and issue, under its mortgage aforesaid, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States its bonds in an amount equal to the said aggregate amount arrived at as above provided, each of which bonds shall be for the principal sum of $1,000 and shall be payable as provided for in this act. Said bonds shall be dated on January 1, 1897, and shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st days of July and January in each year, beginning on the 1st day of July, 1897, and continuing until said bonds shall be paid. The said bonds shall at the time of the execution and delivery of the said mortgage be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be received by and on behalf of the United States as provisional payment of said aggregate amounts of indebtedness arrived at, as provided in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 4. That the Union Pacific Railway Company shall execute and deliver its mortgage and bonds to the United States for the debts of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and of the Kansas Pacific Railway Company to the United States, and the said bonds shall be numbered consecutively from 1 to a number which will include the whole amount thereof, and shall be payable in lawful money of the United States. Said company shall, on the 1st day of January of each year, for a period of ten years, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1898, pay to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in addition to the interest which shall then be due on its said bonds so to be issued and delivered to him, the sum of $365,000 per annum, and for ten years commencing on the 1st day of January, 1908, shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to the interest which shall then be due on its said bonds, the sum of $550,000 per annum; and thereafter, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1918, said company shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to the interest which shall then be due on its said bonds, the sum of $750,000 per annum until the whole amount of said bonds shall have been fully paid. The payments of principal shall be applied in payment of the bonds of said company to an amount equal to such payment and in the order of the number of such bonds, beginning with the highest unpaid number. Each of said bonds, respectively, when paid, shall thereupon be canceled and surrendered to the company, and no other bonds under said mortgage shall be issued by said company in lieu thereof. When the said bonds and mortgage securing the same shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury, then, in case the lien thereof is subject only to the lien securing the new first mortgage bonds referred to in clause 1 of section 5 hereof, the lien of the United States upon any of the railroad and property embraced in said mortgage and all charge or claim of the United States upon any part of the revenues of such property under or by virtue of any existing laws shall cease and determine. When the bonds issued under section 3 of this act shall have been paid in full, as herein provided, the indebtedness represented thereby shall be wholly discharged and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cancel and discharge the mortgage given to secure the same under this act.

SEC. 5. That for the purpose of refunding its mortgage indebtedness upon such terms as it may be able to agree upon with its security holders and as will enable it to effect the settlement of its indebtedness to the United States as herein provided, the said Union Pacific Railway Company is hereby authorized and empowered to issue its new mortgage bonds and stock within the limitations defined in this section: Provided, however, That out of the use or proceeds of sale of the new securities, hereby authorized to be made and issued, or otherwise, all existing bonds secured by mortgages upon any part of the railway property and lands of the Union Pacific Railway Company shall be retired and extinguished, and the mortgages securing the same shall be satisfied and discharged, with the effect that the new mortgages herein authorized to be made shall be the only liens upon the entire railway property, equipment, lands, and franchises of the Union Pacific Railway Company covered by its said existing mortgages, and that the second mortgage herein authorized to be executed to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall upon said entire mortgaged premises be junior and subject to no other lien and charge than the new first mortgage herein authorized securing new bonds to the amount hereinafter limited.

First. It may make, issue, and negotiate its bonds dated January 1, 1897, and maturing January 1, 1947, and bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st days of January and July of each year until the maturity thereof, to the face amount of all outstanding first-mortgage bonds prior in lien to the lien of the United States on the subsidized part of its railway, and those secured by mortgages constituting first liens upon parts of the unsubsidized railway, terminal properties, equipment, or upon lands of the said company, and those secured by mortgages upon the Omaha bridge, amounting in all to the sum of $54,731,000, and to secure the payment of said bonds by a first mortgage upon all the lines of railway, rights of way, terminals, terminal properties, bridges, rolling stock, and equipment, and all the then unsold land-grant lands, and all the then outstanding land and town-lot contracts, and upon all other property embraced in such existing mortgages of the Union Pacific Railway Company, and upon all of its rights, privileges, and franchises.

Second. It may make and issue its preferred stock to an amount not exceeding its present outstanding stock: Provided, however, That no dividends for any one year shall be paid upon such preferred stock in excess of the rate of 4 per cent nor except out of such net or surplus earnings as shall be acquired by said company in that year and as shall remain after the payment of operating expenses, and the interest upon said new first-mortgage bonds, and the interest and fixed annual sums required to be paid upon said second-mortgage bonds hereinbefore authorized to be issued.

SEC. 6. That in the event that the railroad and property of the Union Pacific Railway Company contemplated to be embraced in the new mortgage in this act authorized shall be sold under pending foreclosure proceedings or other proceedings now or hereafter instituted, but subject to all the existing liens of the United States thereon or on any parts thereof, the purchasers of said railway and property who shall have acquired the same subject to such liens of the United States and who shall have filed with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States their written acceptance of the provisions of this act applicable to the Union Pacific Railway Company within the time hereinafter limited for the filing of such acceptance by the said Union Pacific Railway Company, or within such extended time not exceeding six months as may for good cause be prescribed by the President of the United States, shall be, and they are hereby, together with their associates and their successors, created a corporation by the name and style of "Union Pacific Railroad Company." Such purchasers and their associates shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States a written instrument executed by them as incorporators, designating fifteen persons to act as directors of the said corporation, and such persons so designated, or a majority of them, shall meet within thirty days after the filing of such instrument, at the place where the annual meetings of the stockholders of the Union Pacific Railway Company are held, and shall elect officers of said new company under the same conditions and requirements as to procedure and character of official organization as are prescribed by law and the by-laws of the Union Pacific Railway Company in respect of a meeting of the directors of said last-named company held for like purposes.

Said new corporation shall have the power to acquire all or any part of the railways and properties of the Union Pacific Railway Company and to provide for the said indebtedness of the said last-named company to the United States by the issue to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of bonds of the same character and amount as those herein authorized to be made by the Union Pacific Railway Company, secured by mortgage of the same nature, extent, and relative lien as that authorized to be made by it in section 2 hereof; and shall have and be entitled to enjoy and exercise rights, powers, privileges, franchises, and immunities equal in character, extent, and duration to those which the Union Pacific Railway Company would have had and enjoyed had it accepted and carried out the provisions of this act as herein empowered to do; and shall have power to make, issue, negotiate, and deliver its bonds, mortgages, and stock corresponding in character and extent to the like securities which, in such event, the Union Pacific Railway Company would have been entitled to retain in existence and to make and issue; and in all its relations and duties to the Government and to the public, and in the regulation and management of its corporate affairs it shall be substituted to and governed by the provisions of law which would in such event have been applicable to the Union Pacific Railway Company.

SEC. 7. That the statutory lien created and subsisting under and by virtue of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, and the act of July 2, 1864, and the act of May 7, 1878, to secure the payment of said subsidy bonds issued to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, and the interest thereon, as set forth in said acts, and upon all the property subject to said statutory lien, shall be and remain in full force for security for the debts owing by each of said companies to the United States until the issue and delivery to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of the bonds and mortgage hereinbefore provided for, to be subject only to the new first mortgage and to the bonds secured thereby, and until existing mortgages shall have been satisfied and discharged as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain the amount of the respective indebtedness of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, to which the subsidy bonds of the United States were advanced in aid of the construction of the Pacific railroad and branches, as of the 1st day of January, 1897, upon the same principle as if the whole sum of said bonds and interest paid and to be paid by the United States thereon and not theretofore repaid, by credits on account thereof were due and payable to the United States in cash on said day; and the said sum shall be computed and ascertained as follows:

First. To the whole of the principal of the said subsidy bonds attributable to each of said companies shall be added the interest paid or to be paid by the United States upon the same, so as to ascertain the total amounts that would have been due the United States for principal and interest paid on the bonds issued to each of said companies at their maturity if no payments or reimbursements had been made thereon by the companies.

Second. From said amounts so ascertained shall be deducted any payments or reimbursements made by or on behalf of either of said companies upon their indebtedness at any time before the 1st day of January, 1897, as shall appear in the bond and interest accounts of the said companies, respectively, with the United States.

Third. Compute the present worths of the amounts so found as of the 1st day of January, 1897, on the basis that money is worth 2 per cent per annum during the period between the date of average maturity of the said bonds and the 1st day of January, 1897. From the sums so ascertained there shall be deducted the amounts in the sinking fund applicable to the said companies respectively, computing the value of any bonds in said sinking fund at their market value, at the time of such computation, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and said sinking fund shall thereupon be applied as a payment upon the debt of such companies to the United States. The aggregate amounts so arrived at shall be deemed the sums that would be required to be paid in cash on the said 1st day of January, 1897, by said companies for the purpose of completely discharging their entire debts to the United States.

SEC. 9. That the Central Pacific Railroad Company, successor to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, be, and is hereby, authorized to make, issue, and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to receive the same, its certain indenture of mortgage, which shall bear date the 1st day of January, 1897, covering and embracing the entire property of such company, as at present consolidated, real, personal, and mixed, including all the right, title, and interest of such company in any stocks, bonds, or securities, or lands of any branch lines or auxiliary companies in which such company has now any interest, and all beneficial interest which it may have in a certain lease of its property to the Southern Pacific Company, as hereinafter provided, and all railroads now owned or hereafter acquired or constructed by said Central Pacific Railroad Company, and all their franchises, telegraph lines, rolling stock, fixtures, and property of every kind and description, as well as those which it, its successors or assigns, may hereafter acquire, subject to any bona fide, lawfully prior, and paramount lien, claim, or mortgage upon any railroads, franchises, or property now owned by such company or which such company may hereafter acquire. A proper and complete description and inventory of all the property affected by such mortgage shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, which when approved by him shall be filed in his office; and such mortgage on the property therein described shall be held as security for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds issued thereunder and authorized by this act; but this section or such mortgage shall not be construed to prevent said company from using and disposing of any of its property or assets in the ordinary, proper, and lawful course of its current business in good faith and for valuable consideration, nor to prevent said company from applying the rentals derived from said lease to the payment of dividends to its stockholders to the extent that dividends are permitted by this act; and said company may sell and convey for valuable consideration any lands included in its said grant and apply the proceeds thereof as required by the provisions of any mortgage or liens thereon prior to the mortgage given by this act: Provided, That every such disposition of any stocks, bonds, securities, or other property owned by said company, whether by sale, pledge, or otherwise, shall be reported to the Secretary of the Treasury by said company within thirty days after such disposition has been made, and that the bonds, stocks, obligations, or other property acquired with the proceeds of the property so disposed of shall, except as hereinbefore provided, in like manner and with the same power to dispose of the same, be subject to the lien of the said mortgage, and that true and proper descriptions and lists of the same shall be from time to time prepared and filed with the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 10. That the said Central Pacific Railroad Company is hereby authorized to make, execute, and issue under its mortgage aforesaid its bonds in an amount equal to the said aggregate amount arrived at as above provided, each of which bonds shall be for the principal sum of $1,000 and shall be payable as provided in this act. Said bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st days of January and July in each year, beginning on the 1st day of July, 1897, and continuing until said bonds shall be paid. The said bonds shall, at the time of execution and delivery of the said mortgage, be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be received by and on behalf of the United States as provisional payment of said aggregate amounts arrived at as provided in section 7 of this act, and the corporate character of the Central Pacific Railroad Company shall continue until the bonds authorized to be issued under this act shall have been fully paid.

SEC. 11. That the Central Pacific Railroad Company shall execute and deliver its mortgage and bonds to the United States for the debts of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company to the United States, and the said bonds shall be numbered consecutively from 1 to a number which will include the whole amount thereof and shall be payable in lawful money of the United States. Said company shall, on the 1st day of January of each year, for a period of ten years, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1898, pay to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in addition to the interest which shall then be due on its indebtedness, the sum of $300,000 per annum, and for ten years commencing on the 1st day of January, 1908, said company shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to the interest which shall then be due on its indebtedness, the sum of $500,000 per annum, and thereafter, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1918, said company shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to the interest which shall be due on its indebtedness, the sum of $750,000 per annum until the whole amount of said bonds shall have been fully paid. The said payments of principal shall be applied in payment of the bonds of said company to an amount equal to such payment and in the order of the numbers of such bonds, beginning with the highest unpaid number. Each of said bonds, respectively, when paid, shall thereupon be canceled and surrendered to the company, and no other bonds under said mortgage shall be issued by said company in lieu thereof. When such bonds shall have been paid in full as herein provided, the indebtedness of the said companies hereinbefore referred to shall be wholly discharged, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cancel and discharge the mortgage given to secure the same under this act.

SEC. 12. That the statutory lien created and subsisting under and by virtue of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, and the act of July 2, 1864, and the act of May 7, 1878, to secure the payment of said subsidy bonds issued to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company and the interest thereon, as set forth in said acts, and upon all the property subject to said statutory lien, shall be and remain in full force for security for the debts owing by each of said companies to the United States until all the liens on the property affected by the said mortgage and existing at the time of its delivery and which were created subsequent to the said statutory lien shall have been paid, satisfied, and discharged of record.

SEC. 13. That whenever in the opinion of the President of the United States it shall be deemed necessary to the protection of the interests and the preservation of the security of the United States in respect of its lien, mortgage, or other interest in any of the property of the several companies named in this act upon which a lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance paramount to the right, title, or interest of the United States in the same property or any part of the same may exist and be then lawfully liable to be enforced, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under the direction of the President, redeem or otherwise clear off such paramount lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance by paying the sums lawfully due in respect thereof out of the Treasury, and the United States shall thereupon become and be subrogated to all rights and securities theretofore pertaining to the debt, mortgage, lien, or other incumbrance in respect of which such payment shall have been made: Provided, That whenever it shall become necessary for the United States to pay off any part of such paramount incumbrance as aforesaid, the Secretary of the Treasury may require the repayment of all money paid for such purpose, with costs, expenses, and interest, and upon the failure of the company for whom such payment shall have been made to make such repayment, with all costs, expenses, and interest thereon, within one year after being notified so to do, the whole indebtedness of said company to the United States shall, at the discretion and option of the President of the United States, become due and payable at any day thereafter, and all the rights of the United States shall thereupon be enforced.

SEC. 14. That said Central Pacific Railroad Company shall be permitted, without impairing the present lien thereof, to extend the time of payment of or refund, by issuing new bonds secured by mortgage, any of the principal of its indebtedness authorized by the tenth section of the act approved July 2, 1864, as amended by act approved March 3, 1865, at a lower rate of interest than it now bears (not to exceed 5 per cent per annum, payable semiannually).

SEC. 15. That each of the mortgages authorized by provisions of sections 2 and 9 of this act shall contain a covenant providing that, in the event of any default continuing for six months in the regular payment of interest on the bonds secured thereby or of the payments of principal required by sections 4 and 11 of this act, the entire debt due to the United States from the company making such default shall, at the option of the President of the United States, immediately mature, and the United States shall be thereupon entitled to enter upon and take possession of the mortgaged properties of such defaulting company without applying to the courts or to Congress for authority so to do, or may at its option institute and maintain appropriate proceedings at law or in equity in any court or courts of competent jurisdiction for the enforcement of its claims or liens under said bonds or mortgage; and such mortgages shall also contain such other terms and stipulations in conformity with the provisions of this act as may be deemed necessary efficiently to secure the said bonds and the application thereto of the moneys paid to the Secretary of the Treasury for retiring the principal thereof, and as may be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. The said mortgages shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and upon the delivery thereof shall respectively be valid and subsisting mortgages each of all the property of said mortgagor company, real, personal, and mixed, embraced, covered, or required by the terms of this act, and such delivery shall have all the effect of recording the same in any place. Said mortgages, or copies thereof certified by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall at all times be open to public inspection under such rules and regulations as the said Secretary may prescribe, and, for the greater publicity of the contents of said mortgages, copies thereof certified by the Secretary of the Treasury shall, as soon as may be after their respective delivery, be deposited with and recorded by each of the clerks of the circuit courts of the United States and the clerks of the supreme courts of the Territories of the United States in which the roadbed or any part thereof of said companies respectively is situated, which copies and records shall at all times be open to public inspection. All such copies and recording thereof shall be at the expense of the company.

SEC. 16. That in case default should be made at any time in the payments on account of principal or interest prescribed herein to be made upon the bonds issued under sections 3 and 10 of this act, no money shall be paid from the United States Treasury for or on account of services rendered to the United States or any Department of the Government thereof over or upon the said railroads or telegraph lines heretofore aided by the advance of subsidy bonds or upon any railroads or telegraph lines owned, leased, or operated by the said company that issued such bonds, until all amount so in default upon such bonds shall have been fully paid; but the compensation for such services shall be credited upon the amounts so in default.

SEC. 17. That hereafter, so long as any of the bonds authorized by the third and tenth sections of this act shall remain outstanding and unpaid, no dividend shall be paid by the company whose bonds are so outstanding unless the same shall have been actually earned, nor unless said company shall have paid all interest due on its bonded debt having a lien prior to the Government and all matured installments of principal and interest then due and payable on its debt to the United States under this act, nor unless the said earnings, after deducting all interest accrued, but not payable at the time of the declaration of such dividends, shall be sufficient to warrant the payment thereof. In no event shall either of said companies whose bonds are so outstanding pay any dividend exceeding the rate of 4 per cent per annum unless the said company shall, at the time of declaring such dividends in excess of 4 per cent per annum, so long as any of the said bonds are held by the United States, pay an amount equal to the excess over 4 per cent per annum so declared to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be applied to payment of the principal of the highest numbered bonds of such company issued to the Government as herein provided, and unless the earnings of the said company shall suffice to warrant the payment of such excess and also the payment to the Government. Any director or officer who shall declare or pay or aid in declaring or paying a dividend prohibited by this act shall, upon conviction of any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by imprisonment not exceeding two years or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 18. That this act shall take effect as to each of the said companies and their branches, respectively, as hereinbefore described, upon the acceptance of the terms by the board of directors of such company in writing over the corporate seal of such company, signed by its president and attested by its secretary, being filed or deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury, in the case of the Union Pacific Railway Company on or before January 1, 1897, and in the case of the Central Pacific Railroad Company within three months after the passage of this act, subject, however, as to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, to the requirements of section 19 hereof, and, as to each company, to the completion of the settlement and adjustment in this act proposed and provided, but any company which shall not so file its acceptance shall take no benefit from this act. Upon the filing of said acceptance and the execution and delivery of the mortgage and bonds referred to in the second, third, ninth, and tenth sections of this act to the Secretary of the Treasury, he is authorized and directed to sell any securities held in the sinking fund for said company so accepting and pay the proceeds of such sale to the amount of their value, as estimated under the first and eighth sections of this act, into the Treasury of the United States. Any excess realized from such sale above the value of such securities as estimated under the first and eighth sections of this act shall be paid to the company; any deficiency below such value shall be paid by the said company upon demand made by the Secretary of the Treasury after such sale.

SEC. 19. That the said Central Pacific Railroad Company shall arrange for having the lease now existing between it and the Southern Pacific Company modified so that the Southern Pacific Company shall guarantee the payment by the Central Pacific Railroad Company during the continuation of such lease of the interest on, and the installments on account of principal of, the bonds issued under the tenth section of this act, as prescribed in the tenth and eleventh sections hereof, and so that in case the Southern Pacific Company should consent to the termination of such lease before the maturity of all such installments payable on account of principal of said bonds, it shall, in that event, guarantee the payment by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of such interest and installments on account of principal while any bonds issued under the tenth section of this act shall remain outstanding; and so that said Southern Pacific Company shall consent that the sums amounting in the aggregate to about $2,439,000, standing credited on the books of the Treasury of the United States to the Central Pacific Railroad Company as compensation for services upon nonaided lines (a portion of which is now in judgment in favor of the Southern Pacific Company) shall be forthwith applied to the payment and cancellation of the highest numbered bonds of the Central Pacific Railroad Company issued under the provisions of said tenth section of this act, and the filing with the Secretary of the Treasury of a duplicate original of such modified lease, duly executed by the officers of both said companies by authority of their boards of directors, shall constitute an essential part of the acceptance by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of this act. In the event of the termination of such lease by act of the parties thereto, or any abrogation or cancellation of such lease, the principal of the bonds issued under the tenth section of this act shall, at the option of the President of the United States, immediately mature.

SEC. 20. That either of said companies may, at any time after the execution and delivery of their said bonds, pay the whole or any portion of said bonds, by paying the amount thereof, together with the accrued interest thereon, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon cancel the bonds so paid and deliver the bonds so canceled to the said company. No bonds so canceled shall be released, but the Secretary of the Treasury may, by direction of the President of the United States, sell any of the said bonds which may be unpaid at any time, and the purchase price shall be paid in lawful money of the United States.

SEC. 21. That as to such companies as shall accept the provisions of this act, and in the manner and within the time herein provided as to it, from and after the completion of the said adjustment and settlement, all provisions of law relating to the appointment of Government directors shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and the said office is hereby abolished, and all provisions of law relating to the collection of any percentage of net earnings, and to the withholding or application of any moneys due or to become due from the United States for any services rendered by either of the said companies or any of its branches or auxiliaries or leased lines, other than as hereinbefore provided, are hereby repealed, and all such amounts shall (provided the said company shall not be in default in the payment of the interest of the bonds or in the payments required by this act) be paid to the said company as soon as amounts shall have been ascertained; and all provisions of law forbidding either of said companies from mortgaging or pledging its property shall be repealed, and either of said companies shall, after the acceptance of the terms of this act, as hereinbefore provided, have and possess all the usual powers of borrowing money on its credit or on security of any of its assets, and of constructing or extending its railway by consolidation, lease, or otherwise, and of leasing its railway and property or parts thereof, and of acquiring title to land by condemnation proceedings, and such other powers as are or may be granted to and exercised by railway corporations in the respective States and Territories in which the said railway is or may be situated.

SEC. 22. That each of the companies accepting the provisions of this act shall keep its railroad and telegraph line in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph line, and transport mail, troops, and munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroad for the Government whenever required to do so by any Department thereof, and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid at fair and reasonable rates of compensation not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service; and that said companies hereinbefore mentioned, their successors, lessees, and assigns, shall cooperate in making track connections with all railroads of other companies now or hereafter built to points of junction with their roads, and at any point where two or more railroads shall connect with their roads, or either of them, they and their successors, lessees, and assigns, shall afford to all such connecting roads equal times, terms, rates, and facilities for the interchange of traffic, both passenger and freight, between such connecting roads and their respective roads, and every part thereof. And any contract, arrangement, or device by sale, lease, consolidation, through-car service, or otherwise, intended for or resulting in any preference or advantage whatsoever to any such railroad, so connecting at such common point, or which shall subject any such railroad so connecting at any such common point to any prejudice or disadvantage whatsoever, is hereby declared to be unlawful.

SEC. 23. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to cause the provisions of this act to be enforced, and he shall take all steps needful to that end, and shall make report to the President each year or oftener thereon, which report shall be laid before Congress, and until the execution and delivery of the bonds and mortgages in this act provided for shall be completed all existing provisions of law relating to said companies respectively shall remain in force.

SEC. 24. That this act and each and every provision thereof shall severally and respectively be deemed, taken, and held as in alteration and amendment of said act of 1892, and of said act of 1894, and of said act of 1878, respectively, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, and of all of said acts so far as they are inconsistent with this act, nor shall anything in this act be construed or taken in anywise to affect or impair the right of Congress at any time hereafter further to alter, amend, or repeal the said acts hereinbefore mentioned, and this act shall be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal, as in the opinion of Congress justice or the public welfare may require, and nothing herein contained shall be held to deny, exclude, or impair any right or remedy in the premises now existing in favor of the United States. This act shall be published and printed as a public act and in all proceedings may be cited as such.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have just one word to say in reference to the last remarks of the Senator from Iowa. I regret very much that he has taken occasion to assail the Populist leader of 1892 at a time and in a place where that gentleman can not be heard, for I assure you, Mr. President, and the country, too, that if James B. Weaver were present here and it were lawful for him to speak in this Chamber, the language of the Senator from Iowa would have been a little more moderate, a little less offensive than it has been at this time.

Mr. GEAR. I beg to say to the Senator that I have met the honorable gentleman whom he supported for the Presidency in the other branch of Congress. I am ready to meet him at any time.

Mr. ALLEN. It was never voluntary. It was under compulsion.

Mr. GEAR. Not at all.

Mr. ALLEN. It was under duress.

Mr. GEAR. Not at all.

Mr. ALLEN. It was under duress. The world can rest assured that it was under duress.

Mr. GEAR. I am not in the habit of meeting folks in that way.

Mr. ALLEN. James B. Weaver is one of the most illustrious and intelligent citizens of the United States, a man of great character, a man of great ability, of great mental force, of great attainments; a man whose character can not be impeached by any honest man, and I can not understand it—I did not see it, but I heard it—how reference to a man whose character is so well established in all these respects, and whose name has been mentioned here in derision, is greeted with a significant guffaw from one of the distinguished representatives of the State of which he is an honored citizen. I heard the guffaw. I did not see the facial expression at the time it was uttered.

Mr. President, it will not do for the Senator from Iowa to stand in this Chamber and say that James B. Weaver wants to confiscate property. There is not a child 5 years old who does not know that that statement is false.

Mr. GEAR. Does not the Senator consider—

Mr. ALLEN. I do not undertake—

Mr. GEAR. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Iowa can not crawl out of the statement.

Mr. GEAR. Will the Senator answer a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEAR. Does the Senator take the ground that it is the right of the Government to take all the corporate property of this country—the railways, telegraph and telephone lines—and pay for them in unlimited issues of greenbacks? That is the ground that James B. Weaver stands on, the Ocala platform, for I have heard him argue it and defend it in his own Congressional district. I was there when he moved into that district in 1892, the Council Bluffs district, and spoke against Mr. HAGER. I heard him argue in favor of that idea. That is the platform he stands on. I call it confiscation.

Mr. ALLEN. He does not stand on that platform.

Mr. GEAR. You can dispute with James B. Weaver himself.

Mr. ALLEN. No, I will not dispute with James B. Weaver himself; I dispute with the Senator from Iowa. He is in this Chamber. I am his equal here, and anywhere else, for that matter. He can not stand here and utter falsehoods of that kind against one of the greatest and most illustrious citizens of the United States because he happens to be a Populist and go unwhipped of the rebuke his language justly and necessarily deserves.

Mr. HOAR. I call the Senator from Nebraska to order and ask that his words be taken down.

Mr. ALLEN. I call the Senator from Massachusetts to order and demand that his words be taken down. I resume my seat under the rule until my words are taken down.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senator from Nebraska be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. HOAR. The words have to be taken down, and they have to be ruled upon by the Chair.

Mr. FAULKNER. There is nothing in the rule which requires the Chair to rule upon the question before such a motion is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the first observation of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. FAULKNER. The motion I make is that the Senator from Nebraska be allowed to proceed in order. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests that the Chair must rule upon the language as taken down as to whether or not it is parliamentary. The rule simply requires that the language shall be read from the desk for the information of the Senate. It does not require that the Chair shall submit the question to the Senate if a motion similar to the one I have made intervenes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the reading of the rule.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XIX.

DEBATE.

1. When a Senator desires to speak he shall rise and address the presiding officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized, and the Presiding Officer shall recognize the Senator who shall first address him. No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer; and no Senator shall speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate; which shall be determined without debate.

2. If any Senator, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall, or any Senator may, call him to order; and when a Senator shall be called to order he shall sit down, and not proceed without leave of the Senate, which, if granted, shall be upon motion that he be allowed to proceed in order; which motion shall be determined without debate.

3. If a Senator be called to order for words spoken in debate, upon the demand of the Senator or of any other Senator, the exceptionable words shall be taken down in writing, and read at the table for the information of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Chandler,	Gray,	Roach,
Allen,	Chilton,	Hawley,	Shoup,
Allison,	Clark,	Hill,	Smith,
Bacon,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Stewart,
Baker,	Cullom,	Jones, Ark.	Teller,
Bate,	Dubois,	McBride,	Turpie,
Berry,	Elkins,	Martin,	Vest,
Brice,	Faulkner,	Nelson,	Vilas,
Brown,	Frye,	Pasco,	Walthall,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	Peffer,	Warren,
Caffery,	Gear,	Perkins,	Wetmore,
Call,	Gibson,	Pettigrew,	White,
Canron,	Gordon,	Platt,	Wolcott,
Carter,	Gorman,	Pugh,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the words be read.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suppose that under the rule the proper proceeding is to have the words taken down and read. I have made a motion that the Senator from Nebraska be allowed to proceed in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Have the words been read to the Senate.

Mr. FAULKNER. They have not been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the alleged censurable words to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

No; I will not dispute with James B. Weaver himself. I dispute with the Senator from Iowa. He is in this Chamber. I am his equal here, and anywhere else for that matter. He can not stand here and utter falsehoods of that kind against one of the greatest and most illustrious citizens of the United States because he happens to be a Populist, and go unwhipped of the rebuke his language justly and necessarily deserves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What action will the Senate take?

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senator from Nebraska be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. HOAR. Is that motion debatable?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not debatable, as is expressly stated in the rule.

Mr. HOAR. I asked the Chair, and not the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. FAULKNER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. I so understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Senator from Nebraska be allowed to proceed in order.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—

Mr. GEAR. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield for one moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. To the language used by the Senator from Nebraska I take no exception. I have lived among the people where I have made my home for more years almost than the Senator has lived in his life. They know best whether the words he has stated are true or false. I am satisfied now, if I never was before, of the truth of an old adage. When I got into this unfortunate altercation with the Senator from Nebraska I made a mistake. It is an old saying that you can not "touch pitch without being defiled." I am sorry that I had the altercation with him.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am very glad indeed to be able to defile a gentleman who has seen so much of this world and who has had such a varied experience as my distinguished and always amiable friend, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], upon whom I look more as a misguided father than in any other respect. I also thank the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for having my words taken down, words that were perfectly parliamentary. Of course it served to interrupt the proceedings here and to deprive me of some time to discuss this matter. I am always glad to know that the amiable and distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts has a kindly eye upon me and watches me to see that I do no damage in this Chamber, and who is always especially careful of what I say when I am discussing Populistic doctrines and Populistic statesmen.

When called to order by the distinguished and always amiable Senator from Massachusetts I was denying the statement made by the honorable junior Senator from Iowa that James B. Weaver is a confiscationist. Let me proceed at that point and repeat the statement briefly. I said, Mr. President, and I repeat, and I am sorry to be compelled to repeat anything here, that James B. Weaver is one of the most illustrious citizens of the United States, and I am glad to have this distinguished audience and presence here to listen to me when I state that there is not a man between the two oceans or between Canada and the Gulf of Mexico who is better equipped from his experience as a soldier and his experience as a statesman, his great education and his great capacity, to discharge public duties than is James B. Weaver. I have a larger audience now than I had a few moments ago when I was called to my chair, and I wish to call attention to the fact that when I mentioned the name of this illustrious soldier and statesman as a distinguished citizen of the State of Iowa and a distinguished citizen of the United States a guffaw from the junior Senator from Iowa, audible all over the Chamber, greeted the statement.

Mr. President, Populist as I am, incompetent as I necessarily must be to discharge public duties in the estimation of the junior Senator from Iowa and his sympathizers and associates, living out on the prairies among the coyotes and the prairie dogs, I have been taught better manners than that. I would not greet the name of the humblest citizen of this nation with a rough guffaw in the Senate of the United States or in any other place where I could be put.

The honorable junior Senator from Iowa says that James B. Weaver was a confiscationist, and wanted to confiscate the railroads and telegraphs of the United States. I said, and I repeat it, the statement is false. There never was any truth in it. I do not mean by that to reflect upon the junior Senator from Iowa. I do not mean to carry with that the implication that the honorable Senator from Iowa made that statement maliciously or knowing it to be untrue. I simply say, as a matter of fact, that it is false; that is all.

I repeat, the honorable junior Senator from Iowa and my always amiable and distinguished and learned friend, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, never rendered this country the valuable services, never gave the intellectual or the moral force to the up-building of this nation that James B. Weaver has given to it; never. That, Mr. President, is greeted with a smile and a grin and an audible expression of disapproval, as the name was greeted a moment ago in a like manner and in a rougher manner. Mr. President, there is no more law-abiding citizen than James B. Weaver. He is one of the greatest lawyers the State of Iowa ever produced. I doubt if he has an equal as a lawyer in this Chamber. He is a very great lawyer and is illustrious in courts of this country where many men who sneer at his name would not be permitted even to take a back seat. He is not only a great lawyer, but he is a distinguished soldier, whose valor has been illustrated upon more than thirty fields of carnage in this country, and he bears upon his person honorable wounds.

Now, sir, because that man happens to be a Populist, because that man, whose ancestors came to this country long before the Revolutionary war, who is an American citizen from the soles of his feet to the crown of his head, happens to look upon political questions a little differently from the junior Senator from Iowa and my always distinguished and learned and accomplished friend from Massachusetts, his name is to be met with a sneer and his defenders are to be called down in this Chamber as violating the rules for speaking in his behalf.

No, Mr. President, he is not a confiscationist. The statement is untrue. James B. Weaver believes in the doctrine of the Populist party. He believes that this is a government of the people, as it should be; a government by the people, and for the people. He is not of that class of statesmen who sail under false colors, who give their words to the people and consecrate their lives and give their votes to the corporations. There are some statesmen in this country who do that.

James B. Weaver believes in the Government ownership of railroads, in the Government ownership of all telegraphs and telephones. Does the honorable Senator from Iowa have any argument that he can use against the accomplishment of that purpose? Does he not know that over thirty of the nations of the earth to-day own and operate their own railroads? It is something to be laughed at, is it not? It is something to be greeted with scorn and a guffaw when the name of a man who believes in that happens to be mentioned here.

How are you going to get possession of the railroads? The honorable Senator from Iowa, for whom I have great respect and whom I love as a son should love a father, seems to think that it is impossible to accomplish that result; impossible to accomplish that result—and the Senator laughs again as though it was funny and a thing to be laughed at.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. We are not laughing at what the Senator says; we are laughing at the way the Senator says it. We can not help that.

Mr. ALLEN. I was not referring to my amiable friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I laughed in sympathy with the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLEN. It seems to be laughable. The doctrine of eminent domain seems to have escaped the attention of my learned friend from Iowa. Of course my always learned and distinguished friend, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, understands it in all of its ramifications. And what is that doctrine? What gives a railroad corporation power to go across your farm in Maine and take your property and construct its railroad upon your farm and exclude you from it? Where did that power come from? Why, it is the constitutional inherent power in every sovereignty, known as the power of eminent domain. Is it not the taking of private property upon compensation for public use? That is the doctrine. It was established in the State of New York in the case of Bloodgood vs. The Mohawk River Railroad years and years ago, and has become the settled doctrine in this country that wherever the public interest requires the taking of the citizen's private property for public use it can be taken under the power of eminent domain. The public interest alone is to be consulted, and compensation is to be given to the owner of the private property.

I ask my honorable friend from Iowa and his sympathizers upon the other side of the Chamber why this Government can not use the same power of eminent domain, the same inalienable power that attaches to the National Government, and when the public interest requires the great railway and telegraph systems to be reduced to Government ownership why the Government can not condemn them, if necessary, and purchase them, paying a fair equivalent for them, and operate them in the interest of the people at large?

James B. Weaver believes in that doctrine. Why, sir, he is fortified by every constitution in the forty-five States of this Union and by the national Constitution itself. He is fortified by every constitution of every country on which the sun shines to-day. And yet that is a doctrine which has never occurred to the junior Senator from Iowa. No doubt it has occurred always to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. Now, what is wrong about it? I did not bring on this discussion about James B. Weaver.

Then the honorable Senator says that James B. Weaver wants to take a limitless volume of worthless paper money and buy the railroads with it. Mr. Weaver never gave utterance to a sentiment of that kind upon the face of the earth—never. Why stand here in the Senate of the United States, in the full glare of public sentiment, in this place where public sentiment is formed and focused, and hold up a distinguished citizen of this country who is 1,500 miles from here as the leader of a doctrine of this kind when it is absolutely untrue, when he does not believe it, when he has never advocated it and does not advocate it now, and when his party does not believe in it and has never advocated it?

Now, Mr. President, returning my thanks again to the honorable and distinguished and very learned senior Senator from Massachusetts for his careful attention to my conduct and my language I resume my seat, and turn the floor over to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will allow the Chair to lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3607) to increase the pension of Kate Grant was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions. The joint resolution (H. Res. 160) to appoint four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JOHN C. DULL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives that the Senate furnish the House with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 716) to correct the naval history of John C. Dull, the same having been mislaid or lost; and by unanimous consent it was ordered that the request be complied with.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 2813) granting a pension to Rita Stine;

A bill (H. R. 3281) to authorize reassessments for improvements and general taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 131) relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. PEPPER February 12, 1896, providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like, with the leave of the Senate, to say a very few words. I do not think it will take me more than three minutes to say what I have to say upon the resolution of the Senator from Kansas. I do not expect to be present in the Senate when the vote comes on, and I am not quite sure whether I shall be present when the speech of the Senator from New York is concluded, if it shall be interrupted by other business on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HILL. I am entirely willing that the Senator from Massachusetts shall proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say that I expect to vote for this resolution in its substance. The question as to what committee shall make the inquiry will be a question of the convenience of the Senate. I am rather surprised that the resolution has found any opposition anywhere. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] will correct me if I am wrong, but I do not understand that it is proposed as an investigation into any imputed or imagined corruption or purposed or intentional wrongdoing on the part of any public official.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is right upon that point.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kansas assures me that I am right.

Mr. HILL. What is the assurance? I did not quite catch it.

Mr. HOAR. I say I do not understand that it is proposed or suggested as a reason for the resolution that there has been any corruption, iniquity, or purposed or designed wrongdoing on the part of any official of the Government or anybody else, and the Senator from Kansas assures me that I am right in that suggestion.

Mr. PEPPER. Not quite as far as that.

Mr. HILL. I would in this connection call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the speech of the Senator from Kansas when he opened this debate.

Mr. PEPPER. Let me put myself right. The Senator from Massachusetts, in his first statement, did not go quite as far as in his second statement. I do believe that there have been fraud and corruption upon the part of some persons.

Mr. HILL. I mean any official of the Government.

Mr. PEPPER. Not the Secretary of the Treasury nor the President of the United States. I distinctly stated in my speech that I did not impute dishonorable or corrupt motives upon the part of either of those gentlemen, as I regard them as men of honor. However, I do believe that the transaction is covered all over with fraud in New York City and here in Washington, but that those men in the end of this investigation will be shown to be clear of it.

Mr. HILL. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the point that the Senator from Kansas evades the question. When you ask him whether he charged anything against any official of the Government other than the Secretary of the Treasury he evades the question. I also ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he thinks it is a proper resolution. For instance, to take another illustration—

Mr. HOAR. I was about to say what I thought it was, if the Senator will pardon me. I rose for that purpose.

Mr. HILL. I will yield, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that it is the ordinary case of a proposal by a Senator, and I do not believe in any preceding Administration of this Government from the beginning any considerable number of Senators would have been found to object to it. The Senate of the United States is charged with important legislative duties. Each Senator of the United States is charged with very important responsibilities to the whole country by the people of the State whose legislature elected him to his seat, and he has a right to the assistance of his associates to obtain instruction as to important facts and the working of existing laws and institutions so far as that knowledge will help him to discharge those duties, and it is a knowledge which never ought to be, and in the practice of the Government never has been until recently, denied to anybody.

The only question therefore, it seems to me, is the question of the importance of the subject, whether it warrants the attention of the Senate or the attention of a committee of the Senate.

Now, what is the matter under consideration? There has been, under the authority or supposed authority of an existing law, a sale of Government bonds, under which it has been stated by eminent financial authority, upon this floor and elsewhere, that at least $10,000,000 was unnecessarily expended. Some Senators, I think, put it as high as eighteen or twenty million dollars; that is, that the first sale of the bonds under the present system was at a rate lower than the bonds would then have sold for in the open market, so that it cost the United States from ten to twenty million dollars unnecessarily. I am not speaking now of the information which we ought to have in deciding whether we will permit the authority to continue.

In the next place, I understand that when the second sales of bonds were made a very large number of intelligent and conscientious people, both in this body and elsewhere, believed that instead of advertising the bonds at a fixed price, such as the Administration thought they were worth, and putting the opportunity for bidding at every Presidential post-office or some other place accessible to all the people, the bids were so made that no person could understand when he made his bid or prepared to be ready to carry out his offer if it were accepted whether it was to be accepted or not.

Mr. HILL. To what loan does the Senator refer?

Mr. HOAR. The very last one. The result of that, according to some excellent authority, is that from five to ten times—certainly five times—the amount actually needed for taking the bonds was locked up from the business of the country. Every bank that made a bid had to lock up so much of its resources to be ready to take the bid if it was awarded to it. Every small capitalist, as well as large capitalist, who authorized a bid to be made or who made it in his own name, had to keep for a space of one, two, or three weeks this amount of money.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator mean—

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I have a wretched head for this kind of financial discussion—

Mr. HILL. I should—

Mr. HOAR. And I will state to the Senator that I will grant him the full benefit of that.

Mr. HILL. I should judge so from the Senator's statement.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that is a gibe which finds its support in absolute truth.

Mr. HILL. I do not wish to annoy the Senator. I want to understand his point; that is all.

Mr. HOAR. I am trying to make myself clear, without interruption, if the Senator will let me. If, when I get through, he does not understand the point I make, I will repeat it. As I understand it, here were $551,000,000 of bids for $100,000,000 of bonds. Is that true? Now, if that be true, $551,000,000 of gold at least had to be locked up between the time those bonds were advertised for and the time the contracts were awarded, so that the transaction was so conducted as itself almost to create a panic, or at any rate a very serious stringency in the money market.

Mr. HILL. Does not the Senator—

Mr. HOAR. I am not attacking it; I am merely speaking of the thing to be inquired into. Let the Senator understand that I am not criticising the conduct of the Administration.

Now, in determining whether we will permit the existing law to stand without modification or safeguard, is it not our duty to know whether under it those $10,000,000 were wasted, and to know whether under it in the last transaction $551,000,000 of gold was locked up from the business of the country?

Mr. President, there is another thing involved in this matter which I think is pretty important. It is said—it has been acknowledged, I understand, by the Senator from New York in this debate—that the proceeds of the sale of bonds issued under the authority given by the law of 1876, revived by implication by the unrevoked part of the statute of 1890, an authority given for the purpose of enabling the Government to preserve the gold reserves and to maintain the resumption of specie payments, has been used practically for the current expenses of the Government. Now, if that be true—

Mr. HILL. The Senator has not listened to my remarks.

Mr. HOAR. I have listened to a great many hours of them.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will have to listen longer, then, to understand the point.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps I shall.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will permit right there—

Mr. HOAR. I will omit that. I will withdraw what I said about the Senator from New York in order to make my point. It is a very hot afternoon, and the Senate wants to adjourn.

Mr. HILL. Go ahead.

Mr. HOAR. I want to make the proposition plainly, if I can. It is alleged and believed—I believe for one and I think the Senator from Kansas believes for another—

Mr. HILL. He believes anything.

Mr. HOAR. I think nearly every Senator on this side of the Chamber and three-quarters of the Senators on the other side believe that whatever may have been the original authority, the money gained by this loan has been used to pay the current and ordinary expenses of the Government.

Mr. STEWART. Nobody denies that.

Mr. HOAR. I will not say that, because the Senator from

New York will interrupt me if I say it; but a great many men in high station and in high authority believe it.

I hold it a very serious thing, indeed, that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury should exercise, or claim or have by implication the power of using, the credit of the United States, without limit and forever, to pay the current ordinary expenses of the country. I can not conceive how any man who takes the name of Thomas Jefferson on his lips, though his heart may be far from him (as is the case with a good many people who have taken it of late), whatever may be his devotion to an Administration that he has helped to elect, can sit in his seat and be willing to have that thing go on. If it be true, it is the destruction of republican government; it is the overthrow of all our maxims of public liberty, of guarding and checking administration.

I want to know something about that. I think the Senator from Kansas has done right in offering this resolution, and has done a public service; and I do not mean to be diverted from doing my duty as a Senator and insisting on having the facts known on these three propositions, in order that we may correct the legislation by any talk about my confederating or associating with Populists.

Mr. HILL. What fact does the Senator expect to know which is not known now and is not in the public records—the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury? You can not know a single other fact.

Mr. HOAR. I expect to have the reasons of the President and the Secretary ascertained, I expect to have the account of what was devoted to the current expenses of the Government put in an orderly, clear, and plain statement, so that the people and the Senate can understand it; I expect to have the circumstances set forth; I expect to have from a committee the proper modification or change of the law which is desirable to prevent its recurrence in the future recommended to the Senate. These matters as they stand now are the subject of debate, of quarrel, of controversy. Somebody gets up and alludes to them on the floor of the Senate, and somebody else gets up and says that the Senator from New Hampshire did something in regard to a Presidential nomination in his own State, and thinks that is a proper and Senatorial argument to deal with such a subject. I think if we get a committee, either the Finance Committee or a special committee of this body, we shall get a statesmanlike, orderly, clean-cut, straightforward, and masterly statement on this subject, which will dispose of it, and will so dispose of it, in my opinion, that no Democrat and no Republican will rest easy until he has done something to prevent the occurrence of this thing again.

Mr. President, that is the ground on which I expect to have my vote counted or paired in favor of this resolution. It is not for the sake of getting any political capital against President Cleveland or my honored friend, Mr. Carlisle, or the Democratic party that I shall vote for it. I know the difficulties and the trials of the past two years; I know what a calamity it would have been to this whole country, irreparable for a long time, not to be recovered from if it had happened, that our silver currency or our paper currency had got separated in value from the gold currency. I think we all believe that that would have been a calamity; at any rate I do. I want to have this great mistake, this great defect, this great danger and insecurity in our existing legislation guarded against. Though I do not often follow the Senator from Kansas, I am happy to be counted as his follower in regard to the matter which is in question.

That is all I have to say. If I have not made myself clear, I shall be happy to explain to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator from Massachusetts does not comprehend this question any better than would appear from his argument, I think he ought to have at least one investigating committee, if not more. It is very strange indeed, if the Senator has been thirsting for information so long in regard to the finances of the country, especially since the last loan was made, that he himself has not seen fit to offer a resolution for investigation.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. Lodge] offered a like resolution with my full approbation.

Mr. HILL. Only recently.

Mr. HOAR. It was offered within three days, I think, of the last sale of bonds.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the question in regard to what has been done with the proceeds of bonds has existed for the last two years. Does the Senator now mean to say that he is ignorant of the situation? Does he mean to say that it has not been stated here in special reports, and in general reports from the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the precise situation of the Treasury, and what has been done with the avails of the first bond sale, the second bond sale, the syndicate sale, and the last sale? Does he mean to say that he does not comprehend the financial situation, and that now all at once he needs information? Mr. President, this belated plea of ignorance will not do. The Senator can not play that upon this Senate. I say to him, and he ought to know it by this time, that, as has been stated previously, the bonds have been sold for gold. The gold has been placed in the Treasury, and then has been taken for the purpose of redeeming the greenbacks. The greenbacks then have been placed in the Treasury—placed in its general fund—where they have always been placed, according to a special report which the Secretary of the Treasury recently made, in which he expressly reported upon this subject, giving all the information which any Senator or citizen ought to desire or to have.

It has been shown further by reports that that fund has never been kept separate from the day of the first selling of bonds; that it has been kept with the remainder of the funds in the Treasury, legally applicable to pay the expenses of the Government when needed.

Mr. President, it comes with very bad grace at this late day for the Senator from Massachusetts to say that he wants to know all about that, and he wants to know whether the Secretary of the Treasury has a right in times of peace to issue bonds for the purpose of raising the necessary funds for the support of the Government. No one has claimed he has; no one has made any such pretense; but when bonds have been issued and gold realized with which the greenbacks have been redeemed, when the law of 1878 stands upon the statute book and compels the President to reissue those greenbacks, how is he to comply with that law if he does not reissue them for the debts of the Government, I should like to know?

That is the law the Administration has virtually asked to have repealed; that is the law of which the President has suggested the repeal. He has suggested many ways by which this question might be avoided in order to prevent the selling of bonds for the future, but Congress has given no relief.

The Senator from Massachusetts says he does not want to reflect on anybody. Has he read the resolution? Has he seen its offensive language? Suppose the Secretary of the Navy had built several ironclads and spent millions of dollars, and a resolution were offered here to investigate the whole subject of their building under his direction, and that resolution should provide that a committee should investigate whether, on any money passing through his hands, he received any commission, or if any officer under him or anybody with his knowledge or consent had done so, when nobody had charged it, would the Senator think that a proper resolution for which he could conscientiously vote without any allegation of wrongdoing, without any corruption alleged? Is that fair? Is it right? Is it honorable? Is it manly? This resolution is full of insinuations, full of reflections upon the officers of the Government. Aye, the Senator from Kansas, while he said he did not charge corruption per se against the Secretary of the Treasury, when the question was put to him, how about the officers of the Government, he evaded the question. What is the language of the third clause of the resolution? I read it:

Whether any officer of the Government, or any person or persons for such officer, and on his behalf, and in his personal interest, and with his knowledge or consent, entered into any contract, agreement, or arrangement, directly or indirectly, with any person or persons, partnership, corporation, company, or syndicate, for the purpose of affecting the price offered or to be offered for said bonds, or any of them, with the intent and expectation to receive commission or personal reward by reason of such contract, agreement, or arrangement.

No reflection in that, does the Senator from Massachusetts say? I concede that the resolution offered by his colleague, the junior Senator from Massachusetts, is respectful in terms; I concede that that resolution, if there is to be any investigation at all, is unobjectionable in its form and language; but this resolution is not so. This resolution purports to investigate details of this transaction in language which implies upon its face wrongdoing. It proposes to investigate the question of the authority of the Government to issue bonds. Has the Senator as a lawyer any doubt but what the law of 1875 still exists for the purpose of supplying gold with which to continue the gold reserve? I ask him the question, and pause for a reply.

Mr. HOAR. Not the slightest.

Mr. HILL. Not the slightest. Here are these eminent Populists—lawyers, editors, farmers, or whatever they are, who say there is a doubt on the other side—I will put their opinion against the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts—and he proposes to join the combine, he proposes to act with them, he proposes to vote for the resolution, he says, by which the very authority to issue bonds is questioned. How can he do it consistently, I should like to know? I am sorry the Senator from Massachusetts is not going to be here on Monday. I shall then undertake to analyze the remarks he has made and speak upon them at length, but I did not see fit to permit his plea of ignorance to go unanswered to-night.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to follow the honorable Senator from New York in the style of his utterance, which is, I think, rather more appropriate to some other places where such impassioned oratory is in favor than to the Senate of the United States.

I began what I had to say with the statement that I should support the substance of the resolution of the Senator from Kansas so far as it provides for an investigation into these particular points, and that I understood he disclaimed any imputation against the President or the Secretary of the Treasury or any officer of the Government. In regard to whether the particular form or phraseology of this resolution goes beyond that, or whether it should be amended in that particular and will be amended by the Senate, I did not consider. I only rose to say I expect to be here next Monday, and shall be very happy to receive any blast, whether of wrath or otherwise, that may come from the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. I thought the Senator claimed the floor to speak to-night upon the ground that he could not be here on Monday.

Mr. HOAR. I said I could not be here when the vote was taken on the resolution. I expect to go away next Wednesday. That is the whole of it.

I repeat that an inquiry into this important transaction, presenting these three points of danger and of mistake and error in our existing legislation, it seems to me, never was refused in any previous Congress to any Senator who had asked it, and I do not think it ought to be refused to the Senator from Kansas.

Now, in regard to the lawful authority to issue bonds for the purpose of keeping the gold supply intact, I not only believe that it exists, but I voted for the statute of 1890 on that ground, and on that ground alone, and should not have voted for what was known as the Sherman Act except that it gave that great additional security, as I understood it, to the credit of the Government.

Mr. HILL. The statute of 1890?

Mr. HOAR. The statute of 1890, the Sherman law; 1890, I think, is the date of it.

Mr. HILL. How does the Senator regard that as affecting this question?

Mr. HOAR. This statute was passed in 1876 as a part of the act for the maintenance of the resumption. Then the statute of 1890, that part of it which was unrepealed, gave the power conferred by the statute of 1876 to the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of maintaining the parity of the two metals. That is the substance of it, as I understand, and that is the ground upon which I myself supported the statute of 1890.

Mr. HILL. I should be very glad to make use of that in answer to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. You will have to get a better argument than that to answer me. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt about that; but I have very great doubt whether there has been any necessity for the issuing of bonds to support the gold reserve. I believe that if other policies had prevailed, both in legislation and in administration, we should have had no necessity for the use of those reserve powers. The gold in the Treasury would have been maintained if we had had sufficient ordinary revenues for the purpose. I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in that. Therefore, that being the fact, I have believed, and a great many persons believe, that this bond-issuing power, whatever may be its limit, has been used for a purpose for which it was never intended by anybody, either at the time of the statute of 1876 or at the time of the statute of 1890, and that the use of it for that purpose constitutes a great public danger and menace. The matter ought to be brought clearly to the attention of the people and clearly to the attention of the Senate, so that a proper remedy may be supplied. I think the American people propose to supply the necessary remedy, or to elect next fall a Congress that will supply it.

Mr. HILL. What would the Senator do with the greenbacks after they are placed in the Treasury, when the statute of 1878 says that they shall be reissued?

Mr. HOAR. If we had a proper revenue system there would be no difficulty.

Mr. HILL. How would you reissue the greenbacks if you did not pay them in the payment of debts, I should like to know?

Mr. HOAR. If we had a proper system of revenue we should never have any trouble in calling upon the gold reserve to pay ordinary expenses.

Mr. HILL. It is not the gold reserve, it is the greenback reserve.

Mr. HOAR. There never has been any trouble in any former Administration in bringing in greenbacks for redemption to the extent of endangering the reserve.

RECLAMATION OF ARID LANDS.

Mr. CARTER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2848) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895," approved March 18, 1894, to report it favorably with amendments. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands were, in line 9, after the word "approved," to strike out "March" and insert "August"; in line 11, after the word "reclaimed," to strike out "and"; in line 14, after the word "settlers," to strike out "and"; and in line 17, after the word "land," to insert "and when such water supply is furnished"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That under any law heretofore or hereafter enacted by any State providing for the reclamation of arid lands in pursuance and acceptance of the terms of the grant made in section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895," approved August 18, 1894, a lien is hereby authorized and shall be valid against the separate legal subdivisions of land reclaimed for the actual cost of and necessary expenses of reclamation, and reasonable interest thereon from the date of reclamation until disposed of to actual settlers; when an ample supply of water is furnished in a substantial ditch or canal, or by artesian wells or reservoirs, to reclaim a particular tract or tracts of land, and when such water supply is furnished, patents shall issue for the same without regard to settlement or cultivation.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BAKER. I inquire what are the changes which the pending bill proposes to make?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill as amended.

Mr. CARTER. I can probably explain the purpose of the bill more briefly to the Senator from Kansas.

This bill is a proposed amendment to what is known as the Carey Act, which donated a certain amount of land to the arid-land States to aid in the reclamation of arid lands. This bill permits what the original bill did not, to wit, that the States, in the exercise of the trust created, might attach to each acre of reclaimed land the lien for the cost of the reclamation of it; and it likewise provides that when the water supply shall have been furnished patents shall issue for the lands.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 4 of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895,' approved August 18, 1894."

SARAH A. BOYD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2557) granting a pension to Sarah E. Boyd; which were, in line 6, after the name "Sarah," to strike out "E" and insert "A," so as to read "Sarah A. Boyd"; and to amend the title so as to read "A bill granting a pension to Sarah A. Boyd."

Mr. SHOUP. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments. They are merely to correct the name of the beneficiary.

The motion was agreed to.

CORPUS CHRISTI CHANNEL BRIDGE.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of House bill 3549, to authorize the construction of a bridge across a ship channel known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Channel, in Aransas County, Tex.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3549) authorizing the Aransas Harbor Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Corpus Christi Channel, known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Channel, in Aransas County, Tex.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will not object to this bill, but I give notice that I shall object to any further legislative business this afternoon.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The amendments were, in section 3, line 23, after the word "owner," to insert "or owners"; in line 25, before the word "obstruction," to insert "litigation growing out of said"; and in line 27, before the word "may," to strike out "case" and insert "suit"; so as to read:

If any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of such bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction, and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge. And in case of any litigation growing out of said obstruction, or alleged obstruction, to the navigation of said channel, caused, or alleged to be caused, by said bridge, the suit may be brought in the circuit court of the United States in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 20, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 17, 1896.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE NAVY.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 17, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read, corrected, and approved.

CONDEMNED CANNON, CEMETERY ASSOCIATION, ST. PAUL.

Mr. KIEFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have considered at this time the bill (H. R. 4456) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to the cemetery association in the city of St. Paul, Minn., to be used at or near the foot of the soldiers' monument in said cemetery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to the cemetery association in the city of St. Paul, Minn., for the purpose of placing the same at or near the monument erected to the memory of Union soldiers who are buried in the said cemetery.

Mr. KIEFER. There is an amendment recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy such articles can be spared without detriment to the public interests: And provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL addressed the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment to the bill, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill:

"And also three condemned cannon for the Grand Army of the Republic Post, No. 121 (Col. John M. Patterson Post), for the purpose of decorating the soldiers' plot in the South Side Cemetery, Pittsburg, Pa."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not competent to amend this bill by adding to it the substance of another private bill pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must sustain the point of order. The amendment would not be in order.

Mr. DALZELL. I hope the gentleman will not make that point of order at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think it a very bad precedent to establish. This proceeding, if entered upon, would have no possible limit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, before that—gentlemen around me appeal to me to withhold the point of order. I am willing to do so for the purpose of hearing any statement in reference to the matter.

Mr. DALZELL. This matter is one in which several members are interested, and it is hoped that we can get these matters through. It is now getting on toward the end of the session, and I do not want my bill sent to the committee, because there is no knowing whether it will ever be reported in time to be passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let me suggest this: If this precedent is established, the very first moment the Chair recognizes any gentleman to ask consent for the consideration of a private-claim bill hereafter it will be absolutely in order, under this ruling, to permit every other private bill by way of amendment pending before Congress.

I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he and his friends will agree not to make the point of order against such amendments?

Mr. DALZELL. The suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee has no weight in connection with this bill. There is only a single amendment possible here. There is already one amendment of the committee, and this is an amendment to the amendment. So that it probably will not go beyond that point; and the trouble the gentleman anticipates can not possibly occur.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Ah, but after the amendment is adopted it would be entirely in order to offer another amendment of the same character, and so on until every private bill on the Calendar covering matters of this kind has been tacked on as an amendment.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is simply anticipating trouble that can not occur.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman can assure me that there is but the one amendment, of course I will not make the point of order against it; although I do regard it as a very bad precedent, as I have said. I will not make the point of order in this case if the gentleman assures me that this is all.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know, of course.

Mr. PITNEY. I wish to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order has been made, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman insist upon his point of order?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not in this case, as I understand there is but the one bill of this character to be offered as an amendment.

Mr. PITNEY. Two.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that there is another ready to be presented, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I insist upon the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; and the question is on the third reading and engrossment of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KIEFER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HARBOR OF ERIE, PA.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call up for present consideration the joint resolution S. R. 131, a joint resolution relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to examine into the feasibility and advisability of the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa., by the construction of dikes to prevent the closing by sand of the entrance of said harbor, and to make report thereon, with an estimate of the cost of such improvement.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this a new river and harbor project? Is it a proposition for a contract?

Mr. GRISWOLD. No; they just want a survey made to see what can be done.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is not with a view to getting an appropriation in the present river and harbor bill, is it?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I do not know whether they will get it or not. It is to investigate the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to hear what is going on.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of this resolution I will say that it is suggested in the Senate that this investigation should be made, to see if there are any remedies that can be provided to prevent the constant drift of the sand from the west to the east, and the closing of the harbor at Erie, which entails constant dredging and building of piers much more expensive than this work would be if it is decided that it would accomplish the object desired. This is a resolution of inquiry of the Board of Engineers.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, because this involves a question that may be raised in a great many other cases, if this is simply a resolution of inquiry having reference to some project of the future, of course there will be no objection to that; but if the purpose is to get a new appropriation on which no survey has been made and no recommendation has been made, in order that it may be inserted in the pending river and harbor bill on the Senate side, it seems to me that similar resolutions would be likely to load down the river and harbor bill so that the whole thing may fail.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The investigation has been partly made, and the subject was suggested in the report of the Board of Engineers.

Mr. DINGLEY. How much is the expenditure that it contemplates?

Mr. GRISWOLD. About $125,000, if it should go through.

Mr. DINGLEY. Go ahead, as far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRISWOLD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MARGARET A. LUTHY.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4712) granting a pension to Margaret A. Luthy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, under the act of January 26, 1857 (Mexican war pension laws), the name of Margaret A. Luthy, widow of Franklin Luthy, late of Lieutenant Allen's detachment of recruits, Missouri Mexican Volunteers, at — per month.

The Committee on Pensions recommended an amendment in line 9, inserting the word "eight."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to hear some explanation in reference to this bill.

Mr. CROWTHER. As the report shows, this is simply to pension the widow of a veteran of the Mexican war. The claim is made at the Pension Department that he did not serve long enough to entitle him or her to a pension.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did he not serve thirty days?

Mr. CROWTHER. The record shows that he served three months.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman if the record does not show that this man simply enlisted, but never went anywhere near the front?

Mr. CROWTHER. He was mustered out at Santa Fe, N. Mex.

Mr. LOUD. That was as far as he ever got?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes; the war closed before he got to Mexico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CROWTHER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR BUDLONG POST, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. ARNOLD of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8077) granting to Budlong Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Westerly, R. I., two condemned mounted brass cannon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to Budlong Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Westerly, R. I., two condemned mounted brass cannon for the purpose of decorating the grounds around the memorial building of said post: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to offer an amendment to that bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding, before the proviso, the words "four condemned brass cannon for Kenosaw Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Danville, Ill., for monumental purposes."

Mr. HILBORN. There are no brass cannon to be had—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order against this, if it is in a separate bill that has been reported.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to be heard upon the point of order. Upon what ground is it made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled upon that once before this morning. The Chair understands that this is a single bill, referring to one subject, and the gentleman proposes to add another to it.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would not be in order.

Mr. CANNON. I did not know that such a ruling had been made.

The SPEAKER. The ruling has already been made this morning.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the consideration of the bill, but I understand there are no condemned brass cannon, and I suppose the bill will be harmless.

The question was taken; and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. ARNOLD of Rhode Island, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM C. DODD.

Mr. SNOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to recommit bill H. R. 981 and report, for the relief of William C. Dodd, to the Committee on Claims for correction.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, let the title be read.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill and report will be recommitted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MRS. MARIA B. BRINTON.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) granting a pension to Mrs. Maria B. Brinton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Mrs. Maria B. Brinton, widow of William P. Brinton, late a member of Company D, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. In order that the report may be heard, the Chair hopes gentlemen will be kind enough to cease conversation.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am entirely willing for the question of unanimous consent to go, and I will withhold my demand for the reading of the report until that is granted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes gentlemen will take their seats and cease conversation.

The report (by Mr. MILES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5667) granting a pension of $8 per month to Maria B. Brinton, widow of William P. Brinton, late Lieutenant-colonel Eighteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, having carefully examined and considered the facts and circumstances in evidence, respectfully report as follows:

The soldier enlisted as captain Company D, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, and was promoted to lieutenant-colonel of Eighteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers on May 2, 1863, and was honorably discharged January 18, 1865, having a record of gallant and meritorious service.

Soldier never filed a claim for pension. His widow filed claim for pension August 21, 1890, under act of June 27, 1890, alleging that the soldier died in South America about March, 1881. She was married to soldier November 17, 1859. Her claim was rejected July 27, 1892, on the ground of her inability to furnish satisfactory evidence of soldier's death.

Claimant alleges that soldier sailed on the Martha Tucker from New York City February 26, 1879, en route to Buenos Ayres, South America, to better his fortunes; that letters received from him by affiant indicated his arrival at his destination and departure from there to Montevideo, near which place he taught in a college; that she corresponded with him at both places until 1881, when, after stating that he intended to leave Montevideo for Rio Janeiro, correspondence on part of soldier ceased, and although letters were written to United States consuls at Buenos Ayres, Montevideo, and Rio Janeiro, and after exhausting every possible means of information, she has never heard from the soldier or others concerning his movements after his departure from Montevideo.

William J. Buchanan, minister to Buenos Ayres, wrote to the Secretary of State September 10, 1894, to effect that he is informed by Consul Baker that William P. Brinton came to Buenos Ayres in 1879 as agent for some lines of manufacture in Philadelphia. His habits were bad, and those whose business he solicited lost confidence in him, and he left and went into the country and taught school. His mail accumulated and was returned to the Dead Letter Office. Later Mr. E. S. Bowers (now deceased) told Consul Baker that Mr. Brinton had died in one of the country towns of the Argentine Republic, but where or when Consul Baker did not inquire. This was probably in 1881.

The testimony filed shows widow used every possible means of locating her husband or finding date and circumstances of his death without avail; that she is without any estate, property, or means of support, except her labor.

In view of these facts your committee believe that the death of soldier should be presumed, and we earnestly recommend the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FISCHER. Pending the right to object, I ask whether the gentleman attends the Friday night sessions to aid in this sort of legislation?

Mr. TUCKER. Oh, yes; I am sorry the gentleman has not recognized me there. I should like very much to see the gentleman there.

Mr. FISCHER. I have never seen the gentleman at a Friday night session.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask the gentleman why he asks so small an amount as $8? That almost takes away our breath. Why not ask for $30 or $50?

Mr. TUCKER. I ask for what the law allows.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GEORGE M'FARLAND.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7285) for the relief of George McFarland.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to issue duplicates to George McFarland, of McArthur, Ohio, in lieu of United States 4 per cent coupon bonds issued under acts of Congress approved July 14, 1870, and January 30, 1871, No. 54972, for $50, and No. 105451, for $100, with interest coupons attached, dated January 1, 1893, and subsequently, said bonds and interest coupons having been destroyed by fire: Provided, That the said George McFarland shall first file in the Treasury a bond in a penal sum of double the amount of the destroyed bonds and the interest which would accrue thereon until the principal becomes due and payable, with two good and sufficient sureties, residents of the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim upon such destroyed bonds and coupons.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman why the Treasury Department does not redeem these bonds if destroyed by fire?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not hear what the gentleman says.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must again ask the House to be in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I understood the request of the gentleman I will state in a word what the question is about. The house of Mr. McFarland, a resident of my district, was burned up, and three bonds, one for $50 and two for $100 each, coupon bonds, registered bonds of the United States, were burned in the fire. He presented his claim to the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department was able to identify two of the bonds, one for $100 and one for $50; the other one-hundred-dollar bond they were unable to identify. The Treasury Department drew up this bill and sent it to me as a proper step in the remedy to be provided.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman tell me what the Calendar number of that bill is? It is from the committee of which I am a member.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is report 1806. I have the report in my hand.

Mr. BRUMM. What is the Calendar number?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not that.

Mr. BRUMM. Who reported the bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was reported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF]. It does not provide for the payment of money. It only provides for a proper indemnity being given. The Calendar number is 784.

Mr. BRUMM. All right. I thank you.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GRANT OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7140) granting to A. L. Robeson Post, No. 42, Grand Army of the Republic, of Bridgton, N. J., four condemned cannon and twenty cannon balls.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to A. L. Robeson Post, No. 42, Grand Army of the Republic, of Bridgeton, N. J., four condemned cannon and twenty cannon balls, for the use of said post: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ANDREW V. SENDE.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2618) granting an honorable discharge to Andrew V. Sende.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to Andrew V. Sende, late private, Company B, Ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, an honorable discharge, to date from the 24th day of July, 1863.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman in charge of this bill to have the report read or to explain to the House why this man should receive an honorable discharge at this late day.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. GRIFFIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2618) granting an honorable discharge to Andrew V. Sende, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report thereon as follows:

The records of the War Department show that Andrew V. Sende (also borne as Andrew Von Sende) was enrolled May 1, 1861, as a private in Company B, Ninth Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, Thirty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, to serve three years. He is reported on company muster rolls as follows: To December 31, 1861, without remark as to his presence or absence; to April 30, 1863, present; June 30, 1863, and August 31, 1863, absent, detailed on recruiting service since June 13, 1863; October 31, 1863, "discharged by writ of habeas corpus on the 24th of July, 1863, by the district court of western Pennsylvania. * * * An attachment muster-out roll of a recruiting party, dated at Pittsburgh, Pa., reports him: "Discharged July 24, 1863, on a writ of habeas corpus, by order of United States court."

In view of the fact that the War Department records show that this soldier was discharged by legal proceedings, your committee see no reason why he should not be granted an honorable discharge, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. TALBERT. That report does not show what the offense was, and I will ask the gentleman to explain the bill a little further.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There was no offense.

Mr. TALBERT. The man was not charged with any offense?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No, sir. He was in the Army for more than two years, and he was discharged by an order of the court because he was a minor.

Mr. TALBERT. He was not brought before a court-martial for any offense?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No, sir.

Mr. TALBERT. There was no charge of desertion against him?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, no; none whatever.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

BENJAMIN F. JONES.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7161) for the relief of Benjamin F. Jones, which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas at a time, to wit, the 23d day of April, A. D. 1853, when Benjamin F. Jones was postmaster at the town of Beauregard, Miss., the said town was totally destroyed by a cyclone and every building in the town swept away, including the building in which the post-office was kept; in consequence of this disaster there was a loss of money belonging to the Government deposited in said post-office building, which said Jones was compelled to make good to the Government; the Illinois Railway, carrying mails to said town of Beauregard, ceased to deposit them at Beauregard depot and carried them to the town of Weason, 1 mile from Beauregard, compelling said B. F. Jones, at his own expense, to transport the mails from Weason to Beauregard, the cost being $97, which the Post-Office Department refused to allow because of want of lawful authority; and the Government sued said Jones, on his official bond as postmaster, in circuit court of the United States for southern district of Mississippi, and said court refused to allow the said item of $97 as an offset; but both the presiding judge, Hon. R. A. Hill, and the attorney for the Government fully recognized the equity of the claim in open court, and gave a recommendation to allow said item of set-off: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be paid to the said Benjamin F. Jones, late postmaster at Beauregard, Miss., or to his order, out of such money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $97, in consideration of the aforesaid loss and services.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire whether this bill has been reported favorably from the Committee on Claims?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it has been.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question or two. I ask him whether the railroad company was not delivering the mail at this station under contract prior to the hurricane referred to in the preamble of the bill, so that the postmaster could take it to the post-office?

Mr. SPENCER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. Then, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that the railroad company would be the responsible party in this case. Under their contract they were required to deliver the mails at a certain point, and if the station or the track was destroyed, the railroad company would still be liable for the delivery of the mail at that point; and therefore it is the railroad company rather than the Government that should reimburse this claimant.

Mr. SPENCER. The matter has been fully presented to the committee, which reported the bill favorably. The case has been fully investigated three times in this House, and the bill has been unanimously reported three times.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman says the bill has been unanimously reported by the committee. I remember this case, and I remember that I opposed it in committee, so the report could not have been unanimous.

Mr. SPENCER. Well, what I mean is that there was no minority report. There is also a statement from the United States judge and United States prosecuting attorney, who investigated this matter, to the effect that there is no other way than by legislative enactment to give this party relief. He stood by his post after the act of Providence had deprived the citizens of that neighborhood of all mail facilities; and there must have been some cause why the railroad company did not deliver the mails, or else they would have been compelled to carry out the contract.

Mr. LOUD. This man stepped in and relieved the railroad company. That is the reason.

Mr. SPENCER. He stepped in and relieved the citizens of the neighborhood; not the railroad company.

Mr. LOUD. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is perhaps a small matter to object to, and I do not know that I shall object, though I think it is setting a bad precedent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members addressed the Chair amid much confusion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that business by unanimous consent ought not to go on until members can hear what is said.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MEREDITH (to Mr. PICKLER). Do not do that. Wait a minute.

The SPEAKER. If the House will be in order, the Chair will lay before it the business in regular order.

MEDAL OF HONOR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the joint resolution (H. Res. 85) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863, with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That any person who has been, or may hereafter be, awarded the medal of honor provided by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863, respectively, may wear, in lieu of said medal, a rosette or bowknot of ribbon, of a pattern and under regulations to be established by the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to determine and prescribe a suitable ribbon for the medal of honor in lieu of that heretofore provided.

SEC. 2. That the wearing of said medal or ribbon by any other than the persons above specified shall be deemed a misdemeanor and subject, on conviction, to a penalty of $100.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue to any person to whom a medal of honor has been awarded, or may hereafter be awarded, under the provisions of the joint resolution approved July 12, 1862, and the act approved March 3, 1863, a rosette or knot to be worn in lieu of the medal, and a ribbon to be worn with the medal; said rosette or knot and ribbon to be each of a pattern to be prescribed and established by the President of the United States, and any appropriation that may hereafter be available for the contingent expenses of the War Department is hereby made available for the purposes of this act: Provided, That whenever a ribbon issued under the provisions of this act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use, without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it was issued, the Secretary of War shall cause a new ribbon to be issued to such person without charge therefor."

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

LEWIS C. SCHILLING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House, with an amendment of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 2224) granting an increase of pension to Lewis C. Schilling.

The amendment of the Senate, to strike out in line 8 the word "fifty" and insert "thirty," was read and concurred in.

JOSEPHINE FOOTE FAIRFAX.

The SPEAKER. The House will next take up the unfinished business on the Calendar. The Chair understands that there are some pension cases coming over from last Friday night. The Clerk will report the first bill of that class.

The bill (H. R. 3112) granting a pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax was read.

Mr. PICKLER. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

Mr. LOUD. Have we adopted the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed at the Clerk's desk that the amendment was adopted last Friday night.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER (having put the question on the passage of the bill). The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. LOUD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 26, noes 98, more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PICKLER and Mr. LOUD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 142.

So (less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

PENSION BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, coming over as the unfinished business from the session of last Friday night, were taken up in their order and read; the previous question was ordered, on motion of Mr. PICKLER; the amendments (if any) reported from the Committee of the Whole were concurred in; the bills were respectively ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and after a third reading were passed:

A bill (H. R. 3990) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Richardson;

A bill (H. R. 2689) granting a pension Charlotte Weirer;

A bill (H. R. 468) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. H. J. Kiernan; and

A bill (H. R. 4475) granting a pension to Mrs. Catharine Gaffney.

On motion of Mr. PICKLER, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the bills coming over as unfinished business were passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER (after a pause). Mr. Speaker, if there is no other business pressing, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering such business as is in order on Friday evenings.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering such bills as are considered under the rules at Friday evening sessions.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do I understand that that was the motion of the gentleman?

Mr. PICKLER. That was my motion; nobody seemed desirous to call up anything else.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar. It seems to me that is the only motion now in order.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not wish to antagonize that motion. There did not seem to be any disposition to go on with the consideration of the ordinary business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If a demand is made for the regular order, this being Friday, would not the House necessarily proceed with the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is in order to make a motion to proceed with it.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee has made that motion?

The SPEAKER. That is the pending motion.

Mr. PICKLER. I have no desire to antagonize the motion. I only made mine because there did not seem a disposition to proceed with the Calendar in the regular order.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and the Clerk will report the first business on the Calendar.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to take up a bill on the Calendar—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that motion could only be entertained by unanimous consent. The bills must be taken up in their order under the rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We could not hear the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I ask consent to take up for present consideration a bill on the Private Calendar under the order of business for to-day.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order, and ask that the bills be considered in their order on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the rule to be read. The Clerk read as follows:

4. In Committees of the Whole House business on their calendars may be taken up in regular order, or in such order as the committee may determine, unless the bill to be considered was determined by the House at the time of going into committee, but bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors shall have precedence.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. It appears, Mr. Chairman, from the reading of the rule that by a vote of the committee the bill may be taken up, and that it does not require unanimous consent to take it up out of its regular order. The bill I speak of has passed the Senate twice, and therefore I submit a motion to take it up now for present consideration. I refer to the bill (S. 32) for the relief of the legal representatives of John C. Howe, deceased, being the Calendar No. 473, on page 34 of the Calendar.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say only a word—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is this debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I only wanted to say that this is a Senate bill, that has passed the Senate twice—

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I may not have caught exactly the reading of the rule, but my understanding was that except where a different order had been previously made in the House, when the House resolved itself into a Committee, the bills must be taken up in their regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule seems to allow the committee to determine what bills it shall consider, unless previously determined by the House.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to speak a single minute—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, this matter is not debatable, but if an opportunity is given for discussion we may want the same length of time to reply to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the gentleman want to discuss the point of order or the merits of the bill?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The condition of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think it would scarcely be wise to take up for discussion a matter that is not yet before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers.

The title of the bill was again read.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the bills be taken up on the Calendar in the order in which they are reported and appear on the Calendar.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I believe that is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. It seems to me that we ought to take up Senate bills and consider them first at this late date in the session—bills that have passed the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is not debatable.

The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts, there were—ayes 70, noes 10.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts as amended by the substitute was then agreed to.

FRANK M. MARSHALL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the bill the title of which the Clerk will read was before the Committee of the Whole when last in session on the Private Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4510) [Calendar No. 123] for the appointment of Frank M. Marshall as Lieutenant on the retired list of the Army.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. As I understand it, when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole it has then power to fix the order in which it will consider business on the Calendar. Now, the committee has determined by the vote just taken that we will begin at the beginning of the Calendar with the bills as they are reported; and I insist that that order will not permit the bill to which the Chair refers to be brought up as unfinished business.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the unfinished business is always first in order.

Mr. SWANSON. Under the rule under which we are proceeding, by a direct vote of the committee?

Mr. DINGLEY. Unquestionably.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand it, that is the general rule. But that rule has been set aside by the action of the committee, and it has been admitted that the committee can fix the order of business. Now, the committee has fixed the order of business, that we should begin with the beginning and consider the bills in the order in which they appear on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is upon the Calendar as unfinished business.

Mr. DINGLEY. And therefore is first in order.

Mr. SWANSON. Not upon the Calendar as reported here. I insist it goes back to the place in which it appears on the Calendar.

Mr. DINGLEY. That would be a change of the rules.

Mr. BAILEY. If my friend from Virginia will permit—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the motion adopted by the committee has changed the rule at all.

Mr. BAILEY. If my friend from Virginia will permit me to make a suggestion, I agree with him in believing that the adoption of the motion which he made was tantamount to laying aside the unfinished business.

Mr. SWANSON. That is what I insist on.

Mr. BAILEY. And it appears to me that the committee, as under the rule it may, has determined to proceed at this session of the committee in a given way, that is, by beginning at the head of the Calendar and going down, and that seems to me to be a reversal of all other orders previously adopted, or an alteration of the regular order. The gentleman from Maine will perfectly agree that the committee, under the ruling of the Chair, could begin at the beginning or the middle of the Calendar or at the end of the Calendar, and then go either way; but in pursuance of the power of the committee it has determined against all other methods of procedure except to begin at the top of the Calendar.

Mr. DINGLEY. It has simply decided to take up the Calendar and proceed in order.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Oh, no.

Mr. SWANSON. Oh, no.

Mr. DINGLEY. It was not competent for the committee to set aside the unfinished business in that way. It must be set aside by some disposition of it.

Mr. SWANSON. The ruling of the Chair is that the committee has absolute power—

Mr. DINGLEY. I think it would be better to go along in the orderly way. We shall soon reach the other bills, and I think we can make more progress in that way.

Mr. BAILEY. As I understand it, it is not a question of progress, but it is a question as to what is the correct ruling. I would agree with my friend from Maine that if the committee had decided to proceed in the regular order, the regular order would be the unfinished business; but the committee did not decide to do that, but on the contrary it expressly decided to begin at the top of the Calendar.

Mr. DINGLEY. But what is the top of the Calendar? It is the unfinished business.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Oh, no.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] will permit me, the case is even stronger than stated by the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], if I remember his motion correctly, moved that the committee take up the Calendar in the order in which the bills were printed.

Mr. SWANSON. Reported.

Mr. McMILLIN. I thought the word was "printed."

Mr. SWANSON. The notes of the Official Reporter will show the language of the motion.

Mr. McMILLIN. If I may be pardoned for one moment longer, I think it will be found that the language of the order is such as to preclude any other idea than beginning at the top of the Calendar.

Mr. DINGLEY. That motion would be out of order.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the point of order was not made.

Mr. DINGLEY. The question is as to the intent of the motion.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, the order of business this morning was as follows: The Speaker of the House first called for the reading and approval of the Journal; second, the correction of reference of public bills; third, the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, and fourth, the unfinished business. The unfinished business consisted of five bills on the Calendar, which were disposed of. That settles the unfinished business. Then a motion was entertained under section 6 of Rule XXIV—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that the bills disposed of in the House were none of them this bill, which is pending before the committee. This bill was pending before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAHON. The Speaker recognized that the unfinished business was through with. Then under section 6 of Rule XXIV, which provides:

On Friday of each week, after the unfinished business has been disposed of—

Which had been done—

it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SWANSON. Then read further.

Mr. MAHON. That is all there is of that.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I want to make a statement right there.

Mr. SWANSON. There is another provision which states that the committee itself can fix the order in which the business shall proceed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAHON. That is section 4 of Rule XXIII, which the Chair had read.

Mr. SWANSON. The point of order made is that the resolution provided that the Committee of the Whole should proceed to the consideration of the bills in the order in which those bills were on the Calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Now, the bill under consideration appears upon the table by a special order passed at the last meeting. It is not the regular order. The resolution was offered by the gentleman from South Dakota, by which it became a special order for that day and that day only. Now, it should not regularly appear on the table. The regular order would be the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the resolution, and the motion was that the committee should take up bills of a certain character, and it was simply to regulate the order in which the bills should be taken up by the committee at that time. Now, in proceeding under that order, the committee took up this bill, and it was pending before the committee at the time the committee rose and the House adjourned. If the Chair understands the motion of the gentleman from Virginia this morning, it was that the committee proceed with the bills in their order upon the Calendar. This bill—

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the motion which was adopted in the committee, and that itself will be the best statement of what occurred. I concede the power of the committee to act in the premises, and whatever it did is the law of the House.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, is the order of business debatable?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has not yielded the floor.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before I make a motion I ask that the Reporter's notes be produced, and until they come I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROW. Is the order of business debatable?

Mr. BAILEY. A point of order is.

Mr. GROW. It strikes me we are wasting our time in discussing and postponing the consideration of bills.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is raised against the consideration of a bill which was the unfinished business on last Friday, and the committee is now waiting for the production of the notes of the Reporter.

Mr. GROW. I move that the committee proceed to the next bill without prejudice to this one.

Mr. THOMAS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been made, and that must first be determined.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the bills be taken up on the Calendar in the order in which they are reported and appear on the Calendar.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think that settles it, Mr. Chairman. We must go to the first bill on the Calendar. I do not know what that bill is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the first bill upon the Calendar is the unfinished bill, and so holds.

Mr. McMILLIN. My understanding is that the Chair holds that the committee does not have it in its power to desist from the consideration of a bill when once it had entered upon its consideration.

Mr. THOMAS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair simply holds that the action of the committee is to proceed with the bills in order upon the Calendar, and this is unfinished business on the Calendar.

Mr. BRUMM. That is not the way the resolution reads. It is as they appear reported on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a part of the resolution. The Chair has settled this point, and the Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the Marshall case be set aside informally, not to be prejudicial.

The CHAIRMAN. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. By motion we can lay it aside.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee has once entered upon the consideration of a bill, the Chair thinks it would require unanimous consent to lay it aside.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to suggest that the Chair read the exact language of the motion made by myself.

Mr. THOMAS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. That has already been done.

Mr. SWANSON (continuing). As they are reported. This bill is a hundred and odd, and the Chair makes it the first. The motion was, in the order on the Calendar in which they are reported by the date. Now, under my motion they should be taken up under the order in which they are reported and appear on the Calendar as reported.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no anxiety about this, because I have no interest in either of the bills. I do not know which comes first on the Calendar, and hence I speak only in behalf of the orderly proceedings of the House; but it strikes me when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole it has the right to designate, when it begins its session, what business it shall take up; and that necessarily carries with it the right to set aside a bill the consideration of which had been entered upon at a former date, if the committee sees fit.

The CHAIRMAN. But the committee has already decided by a motion to take up bills in this order.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the Chair holds that that rule has that effect, of course I have nothing further to say; but, with all due deference to the Chair, until the Chair so ruled I was not able to construe the order of the House in that way.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The Chair has decided this question, and therefore I ask that we proceed in order with the business before the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to criticize the ruling of the Chair which held that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] did not require the committee to proceed with the bills as they have been reported and as they appear upon the Calendar. I hope, however, that the Chair will not adhere to the decision that it is not within the power of the committee to lay aside unfinished business. I respectfully submit that that is a ruling so far-reaching in its consequences as to at some time seriously embarrass the business of the Committee of the Whole. In view of the fact that the gentleman who made the motion under which the committee is acting states that he intended that the committee should proceed to take up the business as it stands upon the Calendar, and in order to avoid such a decision as I have indicated, I ask unanimous consent that the Marshall bill be laid aside temporarily and without prejudice.

Mr. FENTON. I object.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I object.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I object most decidedly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill (H. R. 4510) was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of Frank M. Marshall as a hospital steward, Hospital Corps, United States Army, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint said Frank M. Marshall a second lieutenant of cavalry in the United States Army, and to place him on the retired list with pay of the grade and increase on account of the length of service.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In lines 5 and 6, after the word "authorized," strike out "and directed."

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, has the general debate on this bill been closed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that it has not been closed.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then before the amendment is considered I would like to hear the gentleman who reported this bill explain what its effect is.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, the merits of this bill have been very extensively discussed in Committee of the Whole, and I think the case is generally understood. I will read a few words from the report, which explain the bill quite clearly:

Mr. Marshall is over 62 years of age. He enlisted April 13, 1861, in Company C, Fourteenth New York State Militia (subsequently Eighty-fourth New York Volunteers). March 13, 1863, he was discharged by special order, with view to enlistment as hospital steward, Hospital Corps, United States Army, and he enlisted as such March 13, 1863. He has been discharged, and has reenlisted ever since, so that his service from April 1, 1863, to date has been continuous without loss of a single day. April 17 next he will have served in the Army thirty-five years. March 13 he will have served as hospital steward thirty-three years.

Mr. Marshall served in the field from 1861 until March, 1863. He was in the hospital, suffering from sunstroke, and he saw hard service. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is hardly necessary to enter into a prolonged statement of the special merits of this case, because the bill has been so fully discussed already that nearly all the members of the House are familiar with it, and I believe that most of them are ready to vote upon it favorably.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this the case where it is proposed that somebody who served as a steward in a hospital shall be retired as a second lieutenant of cavalry?

Mr. FENTON. This is the case. I will read one letter which I have here, and then I will yield the floor.

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF THE PACIFIC,
San Francisco, Cal., July 5, 1890.

Mr. F. M. MARSHALL,
Hospital Steward, United States Army Dispensary, Washington, D. C.:

I take pleasure in complying with your request to state in writing the estimation in which you were held by me when surgeon in charge of the Army dispensary. You not only kept the books and performed all the clerical work pertaining to reports and returns required by the regulations, but you took your place at the counter for compounding prescriptions and dispensing medicines. Besides, so valuable did I regard your nerve and good judgment in all matters that I never left the office to perform surgical operations, and they were frequent, without directing you to accompany and assist me. Indeed, I seldom desired any other assistance. I wish to assure you of my highest appreciation of your services, and would be glad to testify to their value on any occasion which you may think I can be of service to you.

Very respectfully,

BASIL NORRIS,
Colonel and Surgeon, United States Army.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this matter was discussed somewhat at length two or three weeks ago. Gentlemen probably recollect about it. I do not desire to consume time in again discussing it at length. I think I can cover the whole matter, substantially, in a few words. This man is now entitled to be retired as an enlisted man. My impression is that if he is retired as an enlisted man, like any other man similarly situated, he will get about sixty or seventy dollars a month.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. What would he get under the terms of this bill?

Mr. CANNON. This bill proposes to retire him as a second lieutenant of cavalry. My impression is that, taking into account allowances and everything, he would get between $110 and $125 a month. Now, I do not know this gentleman. I have no doubt that he served the country well as hospital steward, but I fail to see the logic of retiring a man, when he is ready to retire, at double the compensation he would receive if he were retired regularly under the general law. In other words, I fail to see the logic of giving him promotion and extra compensation as a premium for quitting the service.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Would there not be just as much reason for retiring any private soldier with the grade of second lieutenant of cavalry who had served his country equally well?

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment, yes. The theory upon which our laws provide a retired list for the Army and Navy is that the whole life of the man is dedicated to that service. It is an exceptional service. It represents the armed power of the Government, and the theory is that a man giving his whole time to it becomes somewhat disqualified for civil life. Therefore, with our faces rigidly set against a civil pension list or a retired list for people who serve the Government in a civil capacity—a rule violated, I grant you, as to the United States judges, and one which there is perhaps a tendency to violate in some other directions—yet, with that view and upon that theory for the existence of a retired list, the question for us to consider is whether we are now prepared to say that we will set a precedent like this and say to every worthy hospital steward now in the service: "When you retire you shall have promotion as a second lieutenant of cavalry and receive double the pay that you would receive if retired as an enlisted man, and double the pay when you quit work that you received when you were at work."

In my judgment such a policy would break down your retired list. I do not believe that as a matter of wisdom you can afford to establish this precedent. I would greatly prefer, if it be the fact that this man really stands out like a diamond by reason of his exceptional efficiency in the Army, to give him a fixed sum outright—$1,000, $2,000, $5,000—

Mr. FENTON. Why not recognize his rank?

Mr. CANNON. He never occupied in the service the rank which it is now proposed to give him on the retired list. Why should he occupy it on the retired list after he has quit the service? It seems to me that in these piping times of peace, under our policy of keeping a large number of officers with the view of officering in an emergency the volunteer forces, the one danger of our Army and our Navy is that the number of officers in active service as well as on the retired list will make our Army and Navy so topheavy that the people will rebel. I hope that the House will consider seriously before it sets this precedent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was up for consideration some three weeks ago I took occasion to refer to what I thought the improper legislation embraced in it. I rise now not for the purpose of repeating the argument I then made, but to say that some days after that discussion I received from a gentleman who I understand is a man of the highest reputation (I presume gentlemen here would recognize him as such, at least he signs himself as the editor of the army department of the Kansas City Times) a communication relating to this case and commenting upon the remarks of mine as they appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I have no disposition now to pursue the discussion further; but in corroboration of the opinions I have heretofore stated, I ask the Clerk to read this letter, that the committee may have the benefit of such information as it contains.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., March 31, 1896.

DEAR SIR: In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday, March 27, page 3836, I note the House, in Committee of the Whole, had under consideration House bill No. 4510 for the relief of Hosp. Steward Frank M. Marshall, now and for the past thirty years doing duty in the Army dispensary at Washington. As the editor of the Army department of the Kansas City Times I have had occasion to comment upon this bill from the standpoint of being most vicious legislation, and in view of the part taken by you in the debate in opposition to the measure I feel that in addressing you this note and giving reasons why the bill should not pass I will receive a hearing.

The record of Hosp. Steward Marshall shows that all of his service as such steward has been in Washington. In 1868 and 1869 orders were issued by the War Department for the establishment of a general service detachment of clerks and messengers at the various headquarters of the geographical divisions and departments. See General Orders Nos. 92 and 30, respectively, for the years named.

Under these regulations division and department commanders were given the authority to transfer men from regiments for this duty.

To provide better salary than that given to men in the ranks, there was added to their regular monthly pay commutation for quarters, for rations, for fuel, and extra-duty pay.

Hospital stewards were also detailed for duty as clerks in the office of the medical directors of divisions or departments, and Steward Marshall was so detailed for duty in the Army dispensary. His comrades of the same class, but not so fortunate as he, were doing duty at Washington Barracks, Fort Myer, Va., and at every other military post and station in the country for $35 per month, and doing much harder service, not only service as pharmacists, but as assistants to surgeons, caring for the sick and wounded, a duty never coming to a steward in the Army dispensary at Washington.

Now, then, under the provisions of General Orders No. 44, Adjutant-General's Office, series of 1890, Steward Marshall was enjoying the following pay per month:

Monthly pay of steward.....	$35.00
Commutation for quarters.....	21.00
Commutation for rations, at 75 cents per day.....	21.00
Commutation for fuel.....	9.00
Extra-duty pay.....	10.25
Total.....	96.25

It should be borne in mind that Steward Marshall could only receive this pay while on this special duty, known in the Army as fancy service. He was only a hospital steward of the Army and not entitled to more pay than other stewards of the Army, but owing to the detail, it being impracticable to furnish him quarters, fuel, and rations in kind, he was given the commutation. The fact that the steward was for thirty years in the Army dispensary is undoubtedly due to the influence he was enabled to bring to bear with the authorities to retain him in such a place and not because he possessed qualifications not present with many of the other stewards in the Army and who were not in position to secure such soft duty as Marshall enjoyed, for the reason they had not the influence.

In addition to this, Marshall had the benefit of the clothing allowance for a hospital steward, which he never drew, thus having the entire allowance saved for a five years' enlistment.

February 14, 1885, an act was approved providing for the retirement of the enlisted men of the Army and Marine Corps. These men were to receive upon such retirement, after thirty years' service, three-fourths of their allowances.

Steward Marshall had this privilege open to him also.

In 1886, I think, July 29, an act was approved reorganizing the general service detachment of clerks and messengers by giving them instead of these commutations a lump salary per month, making them in almost everything civilians, while their right to retirement after thirty years' service was not denied.

It was at this time that Steward Marshall lost his big pay; but the pay of hospital stewards was increased by an act, I think, approved in 1890 or 1891, I can not now recall, so that he has been really benefited rather than injured, for had he even continued to receive the $95 per month, as he claims to have received, he would have willingly retired on the pay of a hospital steward, which, with the present allowance, would make his retired pay $49.25. Certainly that is handsome compensation for an enlisted man, and especially for the kind of service rendered by Marshall. In 1894, however, Congress passed another act wiping out the military feature connected with this clerical detachment and depriving the men of the right to retirement after thirty years' service.

It is right here, Mr. RICHARDSON, I desire to point out where the pernicious part of Marshall's demand has the most serious effect on the service in case the bill becomes law. When this last law was passed nearly 100 men were wronged, perhaps not intentionally, but they were wronged and more seriously than Marshall. They had no other alternative but either to remain as a civilian or go back in the ranks as a private soldier to serve out their thirty years to permit them to take advantage of the thirty-year retirement law. One case in particular, that of August Beck, of which I desire to write. This man had suffered severely in active service, having belonged to the "bloody" Fourteenth after the war. Later he secured a transfer to the general-service detachment of clerks and so served for nearly twenty-four years, most of the time as chief clerk for Generals Sheridan, Crook, Miles, Howard, and others. He was a most efficient man. To-day he is a private in the ordnance detachment at Benicia Arsenal. He is entitled equally to the pay Steward Marshall seeks, for his service has been of great value. Beck has a greater claim for relief, for while he lost $125 per month he had to fall back on $13 in the close of his military career, while Marshall is carrying on an existence with $90 per month and corresponding pay on his retirement. To pass the bill in favor of Marshall would be a crime against the Army and country. Steward Marshall deserves no more than any of the other stewards in the Army, and because he has been in an office where he came in contact with those high in authority there is no reason why he should receive benefits that the other stewards could not receive, who, during the years Marshall was enjoying a soft berth in Washington, were following up troops in the field and looking after the sick and wounded. It is possible that Marshall rendered great service to Dr. O'Reilly and others about Washington, but no good reason exists why he should be so greatly favored over the heads of his comrades who have been less fortunate in holding down a "soft snap."

There is now on the Calendar of the House a bill, No. 4573, reported on unanimously by the Military Committee, to which I desire to invite your attention in connection with the bill discussed. House bill 4573 provides that enlisted men now on the retired list should be paid three-fourths of their pay and allowances. When the allowance question was construed by the War Department upon passage of the act in 1885, the Department said that allowances only meant clothing and rations, and not quarters and fuel; yet you have observed that the Department paid the general-service clerks commutation for quarters $21 per month, and fuel $9 per month, because it could not be furnished in kind. By bill No. 4575 they seek to secure this by directing that the Department pay each soldier on the retired list the sum of $7.50 per month in lieu of their quarters and fuel. Now, should this bill pass, the pay of Steward Marshall on the retired list would be $7.50 per month more than the amount I have above stated, or $56.75. Is this not a pay sufficient for any ordinary man per month? Surely, if the men who have served their country thirty years would all be thus paid, they would regard Congress with veneration. The opposition to Marshall's bill is not of a personal nature, but because its passage would set a bad precedent and do the great army of regular veterans a gross injustice. It would be a premium to those who seek soft places during their period of service, for surely Steward Marshall has had such a sinecure, for the record of his service shows this.

Let Congress pass the House bill No. 4575 and greater good would come to the Army. That measure would benefit a thousand retired men, while the Marshall bill would benefit no one but Marshall.

I know that the gentlemen who support the bill for Marshall do so in good faith, but I can not make myself believe that the Commanding General of the Army would give it his support if asked for his views; he knows that the sympathy behind this measure does not come from those who have seen very arduous service with troops in the field.

I hope I have given a plain statement of the case and pointed out reasons why the bill should not become a law.

To pass it means that Congress will be flooded with like measures in the future, and surely it will not then be in a position to say that they are not worthy ones, for, if I cared, I could cite cases by the score far more deserving than Marshall's bill.

Permit me to inclose herewith a list of hospital stewards in the Army, showing the date of appointment, which does not include service in the line prior to such appointment, which in a number of instances was several years.

Permit me to remain, yours, truly,

HENRY SHINDLER,

Editor Army Department Kansas City Times.

Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, Washington, D. C.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hold in my hand the list which the writer of the letter just read states that he incloses—a list of 106 hospital stewards, with the date of their appointment, who might possibly come forward and ask for legislation in their favor similar to that proposed in the pending bill. I do not want to add anything except to say that I do not know personally the writer of this letter; but inasmuch as I have been accused of filibustering in my opposition to the bill now under consideration when it was up on the 27th of March last, I simply wanted to have this letter published. I do not ask the publication of this list of 106 hospital stewards which I have in my hand.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman state how many hospital stewards included in that list have served thirty-five years?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know that any have served so long, except Marshall.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman tell us how many of those hospital stewards have served even twenty years?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman can have the list for examination. I would have to go over it before I could answer the question. But I will ask the gentleman whether he would be in favor of a general law putting hospital stewards, after twenty years' service, on the retired list with the rank of second lieutenant of cavalry?

Mr. NORTHWAY. As a general proposition I would not. I can not answer as to any particular case until the case is presented.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let the gentleman introduce a general bill if he is in favor of such a proposition.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I have not been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] is now recognized.

Mr. BRUMM. I wish to ask the gentleman how many years out of his thirty-five years Hospital Steward Marshall was compelled to serve?

Mr. NORTHWAY. He has been in the Army continuously.

Mr. BRUMM. But how many years was he forced to stay there?

Mr. NORTHWAY. In the service?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I do not know.

Mr. BRUMM. As he was a volunteer, he was not forced to stay longer than the term for which he enlisted. If he chose to stay longer, he must have known what he was going to get.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, in advocating the passage of this bill I want to say I am not acquainted with the beneficiary. I never saw him, so far as I know. I am not acquainted with anybody who has any particular acquaintance with him. I have no personal interest in him or in anyone who is interested in him. I do not know that any person of any standing in the country has any interest in him, and, unfortunately, a matter of that kind sometimes makes a wonderful difference in the affairs of life. I do not know anything of the merits of this case except so far as they are presented in the report. I have no interest in the passage of the bill further than as I recognize the merits of the case presented on behalf of a man who is a stranger to me. I have not been asked by him or his friends to advocate the passage of this bill.

So, sir, I stand here entirely free from any influences whatever which can possibly affect my action. Nor would I at this time or at any time have anything to say upon the passage of this measure but for certain remarks which have been dropped, akin to the question asked just now by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM]. It seems to be argued here: "This man is a hospital steward; we must not promote him; we must not show him any special favor, because that would be setting a bad precedent." It is urged that we have a large Army and a good many hospital stewards, and that if we promote or otherwise show any special favor to one we shall be setting a bad precedent and shall be called on to show similar favors to all. Were it not for arguments like this, I would not ask to be heard upon this bill; for I repeat I am not specially interested in it in any way. But I am interested in meeting the arguments presented here against the bill by certain individuals.

The other day I came into the Hall while the debate upon this measure was going on. That was the first I knew of the matter. I then sent for the report of the committee, which I have since read. I listened to some of the arguments against the passage of the bill; and I propose to respond now, so far as I can, to those arguments. We are told here, Mr. Chairman, in this discussion, that this man was simply a hospital steward. Unfortunately for him that is true. He did not flame out upon the battlefields as a great general; he is not known to fame or to the millions of his countrymen. He is unfortunately compelled to walk in the humbler paths of life.

We are told, inquisitively, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he need not have served in the Army for a longer period than one enlistment if he had not desired to do so; as though it were an objection to him and to his claim before the people of this country that he served faithfully for thirty-five consecutive years his Government. The argument of the gentleman, if anything, amounts simply to the fact that a soldier should not serve his country but one enlistment, because if he does, if he goes beyond that then he is entitled to no possible consideration because he has done just a little more than anybody else has done in the same direction, and did not exercise his privilege of withdrawing after the expiration of his enlistment. I do not understand that myself, however, to be an objection to an individual. This man has the commendation of two or three of the leading officers of the Army, as gallant and brave men as ever entered our service. They commend his services highly, and tell us that he has for years performed more duty than those duties which pertain to the position of hospital steward.

Mr. MEREDITH. Has he not been paid for what he did, all the same?

Mr. NORTHWAY. No, sir; he has not. He performed other duties than those which belonged to his position. He was a skilled mechanic, and performed the duties of a skilled mechanic, and we are informed by his officers that he performed the duty gratuitously. He was simply a hospital steward, and was paid the compensation of a hospital steward, but performed other duties as well.

Mr. MEREDITH. But he has been paid his salary, has he not?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes, as a hospital steward.

Mr. MEREDITH. If there is any position in this country that can be performed by only one man I am in favor of abolishing that position.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I will say to the gentleman that I desire to proceed with my argument in my own way.

This officer had charge of the tools, being himself a leading and skilled mechanic, and performed these duties, as I have already said, entirely outside of his duty as hospital steward. It was necessary that some one should perform these duties, and this man was capable and qualified for the position and performed them faithfully without compensation. We are told also that he was the leading microscopist in the hospital and that in the opinion of experts in that line of service he performed valuable and important duties, services for which he received no compensation, but which were of great value, both in the hospital and the sick room. He has performed efficient duty and performed it well. No one denies that. In fact, the duties were so well performed that his superior officers commended him for it.

Then again, Mr. Chairman, we are told that objection is made on the ground that if we permit this man to be promoted as a recognition to some extent of the services he has rendered we will be doing an act which will result in paying him a little more money; money that he has not earned; and that, I believe, seems to be the entire objection that is raised. And yet we know, standing right here, that we have permitted men to be retired, time and again, where it took thousands of dollars to pay them. But we are told that that is because they are great generals and brave men. I admit that. I voted for each and every one of these bills that ever came up. I plead guilty to that, if it be a charge against me; but, Mr. Chairman, I want to know how could such a man who has received our bounty, a great general—how could he become great if he had not had back of him, to do the hard work, the patient, nameless common soldiers, who performed his bidding; the men who won for him the laurels of imperishable fame? I would be glad to know how he could flame out before his countrymen as a gallant officer and a successful leader if he had not had thousands of brave men under him to go down to death at his bidding? Shall he alone reap all the glory? Shall you say that none of the brave men who by his orders went down into the very hell of death at his command shall be recognized because such recognition may cost a little money?

Mr. MILNES. But this man did not go down in that way.

Mr. LACEY. Let me ask the gentleman if hospital stewards were placed in the position to which he refers?

Mr. NORTHWAY. No, sir; they were not, but they obeyed orders and they performed their duty, and there is just as much credit and as much honor in performing service and doing duty as some of these men did as if their duty called them into other spheres of action. Whether they were privates in the rank or hospital stewards they obeyed orders, and one may have been as brave as the other. The man who could stand in the sick room and perform his duty to aid the sick and the wounded performed the duty which was just as necessary and in many respects as commendable as his brother who stood before the storm of battle. The general officer who is advanced does not shoot down the soldier, does not strike a man with his saber, does not kill anybody with a weapon, but we all agree to promote him, and I agree with that sentiment.

But, Mr. Chairman, I disagree with the idea that we shall not help the nameless common soldier. I deny the validity of the argument here which says in effect that we shall not recognize the common soldier and the ordinary man who has for years performed patient services, humble though they be. I repeat, I deny the validity of such an argument. We are here every day asked to give pensions to the widows of men who long years ago left the Army. At this very Congress you are going to give twenty, perhaps fifty, pensions to the widows of generals who have not been in the Army for thirty years; who were mustered out at the close of the war, and have been pursuing the peaceful pursuits of life since that time. And yet you propose to pension their widows, not at $8 a month that you give to the widows of the common soldiers, but $50, $75, or $100 a month. I have voted for these bills. I am not finding fault with them, but only ask why shall our gratitude stop here? Why not at once, as members of Congress, recognize some one in the humbler walks of life? Terribly afraid of precedent here! Voting away the money to widows of soldiers, widows who could not get anything under any law which has ever been passed by Congress, simply because their husbands were generals in the Army—the name of general being attached to his services—not afraid of precedent in that case.

You will take the commanding general of the Army, when you retire him, create a grade for him, and give him more money. It is right and proper. I agree to it, and have voted for such a bill. Very likely I shall vote for more when they come up. But when we do that I should regard myself as derelict in duty if I did not once in a while recognize some man who was commanded by that brave general. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is nothing in the idea of precedent, nothing in the idea contained in that letter, that we should be besieged by applications to promote. As well might you say we should be besieged by applications to grant pensions, and there may be something in it; but is that any reason why we should not perform a duty? It is easy enough for this Congress to strike at this man, for he has no one to back him except his own services. He has no "general" to his name; it is easy enough to strike him; but I want to tell you that if there is any one thing that is creating uneasiness in the minds of the common soldiery of our country to-day it is the fact that you are passing more pension bills to grant favors to the few who have had the title of general attached to their names than you are for all the thousands and tens of thousands of the common soldiers in our land.

They object, unless you recognize them once in a while, and they have a right to object. If there is any person under heaven who has a right to be recognized and who should be recognized, it is the man who in an humble walk of life has faithfully, diligently, and patriotically obeyed every order of his superior and performed his duty to his country, humbly it may be, but performed it well, so that he deserves commendation for that performance. I deny that our duty ends when we recognize the great, and pension the great, and retire them on higher salaries, and so recognize their distinguished services. I believe you can perform a great duty to the humble soldiers of our country by letting them know that they, too, are remembered. It is easy enough for a nation to weave the laurels around the brows of great men. It may not be regarded as so patriotic to take hold of the hand of one of the weaker ones, but I want to tell you that in the late war our common soldiery performed deeds of heroism, and their great example shall stand colossal in the history of this country, and we shall do ourselves credit and do credit to the common soldiery, do credit to our country and teach a lesson for the future, if we take the hand of one of these humble men and elevate him and say, "Though you have not flamed out upon many a battlefield before the whole country, you are nevertheless just as great as a man, just as noble as a man, and just as much to be commended."

Here is a hospital steward. There is not another one in the whole service like him. There are other hospital stewards, one hundred or more, but no man like this one; no man who has performed the duties which he has performed; no man who has received the commendation of his superiors as this man has received it. If we had thousands of these men all standing alike it might be different.

Mr. MILNES. How do you know that to be true?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I take the report.

Mr. MILNES. How do you know that others may not have as fine a record?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I take the report. If you will read the report you will see the facts. I learned them there. I learned that he stands an exception in the entire American Army. There is no other man like him. I learn that from letters in that report written by his superiors.

Mr. MILNES. Do those letters say there is no other man like him?

Mr. NORTHWAY. He stands as an exception here in asking this promotion. It is easy enough for us to think we are winning glory by striking at such men. It very likely may be easy enough. Perhaps we think we are winning glory by lifting some great man and striking at an humble man like that. We lift a great man, the commander of our Army, because there is no other man there like him. There is but one such man. I advocate this bill because there is no other man like this one. I do not see how it would ruin the country to pass this bill. I can not understand how it would harm the Army. I can not understand how it would be anything but a just recognition of a worthy man in an humble service, and I want it to be known of me, so far as I am concerned, that I had just as lief stretch out my hand and take a common soldier by the hand to lift him up and ask the Government to commend him as though he were a major-general. Others may differ with me—

Mr. MILNES. This man is not a common soldier.

Mr. NORTHWAY. He has been a common soldier and has carried a gun.

Mr. MILNES. Common soldiers do not receive $95 a month.

Mr. NORTHWAY. This man is not receiving $95 a month.

Mr. MILNES. He has been doing so.

Mr. NORTHWAY. No; he has not. That man figures out forty-nine dollars and some cents. The statement about $95 a month is something that is incorrect, if I understand it.

Mr. MILNES. That is the evidence here.

Mr. NORTHWAY. No hospital steward gets any such thing. There is no such proof here. The proof is entirely the reverse. He is getting the ordinary pay of a hospital steward, if anybody knows what that is.

Mr. MILNES. Common soldiers do not get $49 a month.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Of course, because they do not perform that duty; nor do they get $7,500 a year, the same as major-generals do, and yet they are in more danger than a major-general. I submit that kind of argument is not a valid one. This man would not get any great amount—

Mr. FENTON. About $90 a month.

Mr. NORTHWAY. About $90 a month, I am told, if he is retired as we have asked; and the difference in the pay would be the difference between what he would get if he should be retired as a common soldier and that of a second lieutenant; and that would be the extra cost to this Government. If there is anybody feels that; if in these piping times of peace that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] talked about, you put it upon that ground, of the poverty of the Government, then we have gentlemen come in here and appropriate $2,000 and over to somebody else in order to promote him and commend him. I have answered the arguments of the gentleman, or attempted to talk upon this question, not because I had any interest in this bill particularly, but because I am interested in refuting such arguments as have been made. I want to enter my protest here, and to say that this Congress will not demean itself if it gets down far enough to recognize the common soldier and pension a hospital steward instead of pensioning major-generals and their widows. I submit that this is an exceptional case. There is no other hospital steward in the Army like this man. No other man has been commended as he has. The letters of commendation which are given in this report show that there is no man commended as he is, and we are told we can not recognize him although he has been commended by his superior officers. Why? Because we can not win fame by commending such as he. I want to submit to this House that he has performed his duty, and performed it in such a manner as to win the commendation of his commanders. However humble that duty may be, it is to him a duty, as is duty to a major-general. He has performed the duty which he has been called upon to perform, and has been commended by his superiors for the performance of that duty; and therefore I submit that this Congress will do itself proud if it recognizes one humble man.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the bill now before the House ought to have been introduced in the times of the elder Disraeli, that he could have written another book, and labeled it "The Curiosities of Legislative Literature." I do not agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that any man who obeys orders is as brave as any other man who obeys orders. It seems to me it depends a little bit on the character of the orders obeyed. An order to administer pills or to pour out squalls and medicines of various kinds does not prove a man as brave as to obey an order to charge a battery. But I did not rise for the purpose of making comparisons of that sort. I rose to defend the cavalry service of the United States, because I have always thought if I risked my personal pulchritude in any sort of military service it would be in the cavalry, because I have always understood that that was less fatiguing to a man's courage than any other branch of service; and I defend the cavalry, notwithstanding the fact that during war times, and for sometime afterwards, it was subject to the squibs that they were like Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines, who used to feed his horse on corn and beans [laughter]; and notwithstanding the prevalent opinion in the infantry that the cavalry had not put down the rebellion to any very large extent; but I particularly desire to defend the cavalry, Mr. Chairman, because I have been told by some personal friends of mine who have observed my graceful pose on horseback that if I had been of age to have served in the Confederate cavalry there would have been great danger to the integrity of the Union. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not the only nor the greatest danger that I see in this anomalous bill, which seeks to retire a hospital steward as a second lieutenant of cavalry. Why, Mr. Chairman, here we stand to-day with war clouds all about us. The Venezuelan difficulties before us and a great navy just being built up. In this bill I see a budding menace to this infant navy. Because if you can put upon the retired list as second lieutenant of cavalry a hospital steward, pray tell me, in the name of reason, why you can not put a female nurse upon the retired list as a commodore of the Navy? [Laughter.] And if you should have a civil pension list in addition to the military pension list, why, in the name of common sense, can not you retire vivandières, if you ever have any, as notaries public and commissioners of the peace? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Do we not retire a major-general as a lieutenant-general and increase his pay?

Mr. WILLIAMS. My dear sir, a major-general and a lieutenant-general differ in degree, but they resemble in kind; and I can not see for the life of me how a hospital nurse resembles a lieutenant of cavalry in kind or in any way. This bill is simply one of the "curiosities of legislative literature;" that is all.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is not the other a matter of legislation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course it is a matter of legislation. Congress, as a matter of course, has the power to retire a female nurse as a commodore. It is a matter of legislation. I am merely applying the reductio ad absurdum, which sometimes, with some people, is a valuable argument. Really and seriously, Mr. Chairman, where is this going to end? If you apply this principle to a hospital steward, what is going to prevent you from extending it to hospital nurses? And if you apply it to hospital nurses, what is to prevent you from carrying it on down through all these lines of public service which do not bring the people to serve in them, however faithfully, into the immediate presence of danger?

Mr. FENTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FENTON. You agree that a hospital steward is an enlisted man, do you not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; nominally.

Mr. FENTON. Are you opposed to enlisted men being promoted as commissioned officers?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In answer to the gentleman's question I will say that I can imagine a case where a brave private soldier who had had his body permeated by the enemy's lead, who had served faithfully and gallantly in battle, who had perhaps been wounded, and who was in needy circumstances—I can, I say, imagine an exceptional case, a very exceptional case, where I would be willing to put such a soldier on the retired list as a second lieutenant of infantry, if he had served in the infantry, or as a second lieutenant of cavalry, if he had served in the cavalry. But not a case can I imagine where I would vote to retire and pension a hospital steward as a lieutenant of cavalry.

Mr. FENTON. This man served two years in the field.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be, but there is nothing here to show that there was anything exceptional or dangerous in the character of his service. There is nothing to show that he was ever injured, or even that he was ever in a battle. The proposition here is to take a man who happens to be in Washington and happens to have strong and influential friends—for he must have them some where or this bill would not be brought in here in this shape—the proposition, I say, is to take such a man and, because he has these influential friends, to retire him as a military anachronism, a "hospital-steward-second-lieutenant of cavalry"!

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I believe it was Madame Roland who, upon being led to execution, exclaimed, "O Liberty! Liberty! how many crimes are committed in thy name!" So I may say with reference to the private soldier: "O soldier! soldier! how many errors are committed in thy name!" Whenever there is a bill of this kind brought before Congress we find gentlemen talking about the private soldier and about the legislation that is enacted here in behalf of general officers, and attempting to use considerations of that kind for the passage of some special bill, as was done by my friend from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] a while ago.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a hospital steward is not a private soldier. In fact, he is not a soldier at all in the sense in which we honor soldiers. When you honor a soldier, whether he be a private or a lieutenant or a general, you honor him because of services performed not in peace but in war. I have never yet learned of a promotion or of a pension granted to a soldier in time of peace for services performed in time of peace; yet here we have a hospital steward, occupying one of the easiest berths in the Army, a man who was so pleased with his position that he held it for thirty-five years—we have that man applying for promotion and for retirement in a higher grade. No war, no sacrifice, no danger; simply a fat position right here in the city of Washington, with a compensation of $95 a month, I assert again—not his pay proper, but his commutation, rations, quarters, fuel, etc. He receives this commutation right here in the city of Washington, and has received it for years, and now we are asked to make him what? Not to promote him. That is a mistake. He does not ask promotion. To promote a man is to elevate him in the service in which he is, but that is not what is proposed here. The natural promotion of this man would perhaps be to make him an assistant surgeon, as he is in the medical department—to make him a second lieutenant as an assistant surgeon. But that is not what is proposed here. The proposition is to turn him out of the line of his order and his service; not even to keep him in the infantry, but to jump over the grade of second lieutenant of infantry and the grade of second lieutenant of artillery and raise him to a higher grade, namely, second lieutenant of cavalry; because, as I understand, the cavalry ranks next to the Engineer Corps.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that there is no sense, no reason, no justice in proposing such a bill as this. But it is said this man has performed special service; that he is a good mechanic; that he has rendered service with the microscope. I do not know what he has invented or what good has resulted from his investigations, microscopic or otherwise. But whatever may be the facts, we have before the Committee on Claims dozens of persons who, in the military or civil service, have performed special duty, who have come before my committee showing special service for which they have received no pay—architects, for instance, who, while receiving their regular salary as architects, were employed upon some special duty. All those cases are considered, and if there appears to be any special value in the service rendered we make a favorable report upon the bill. If this hospital steward did anything of special value for the Government there would be no trouble in getting a bill passed to pay him for that special service and for that alone.

Mr. NORTHWAY. How would he get pay?

Mr. BRUMM. Let him bring his bill before Congress and submit it to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NORTHWAY. That would be a magnificent proceeding!

Mr. BRUMM. I could show the gentleman dozens of bills which have been sent to the Committee on Claims providing pay for special work, and I believe that this bill could be passed more easily in that way than in the matter now presented. But the amount paid would be a quantum meruit—the claimant would be paid according to the work done. As has been suggested by my friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON], if there is any special reason why this man should receive special pay let us know what the reason is, let it be shown what amount he is entitled to, and there will be no trouble, I think, in getting it through this House. But to say that a hospital steward, who loved his berth in time of peace so well that he stayed there for thirty-five years, shall now be singled out regardless of the order of his enlistment and of the kind of service that he has performed, that he shall be lifted into the saddle of a cavalry lieutenant, seems to me so incongruous, so inconsistent, so foolish, so nonsensical, that I submit the gentlemen who are pressing this bill ought to withdraw it as something that they may well be ashamed of.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is there any service which a private or a hospital steward might render for which the gentleman would vote promotion?

Mr. BRUMM. My dear sir, if you will show me a case where a private soldier or a hospital steward has performed any specially meritorious duty during the war, or even in time of peace if he has been called into active service—in fighting the Indians or anything of that kind—I will wager that you will have to run very rapidly to keep up with me in doing all that can be done for such an one.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Has the gentleman read the report in this case?

Mr. BRUMM. I have heard it read.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Did you understand from the reading of the report that this man, while serving as a private soldier, received a sunstroke, in consequence of which he was placed on duty as a hospital steward, and has been in service ever since?

Mr. BRUMM. That certainly was an unfortunate occurrence for him.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Oh, yes!

Mr. BRUMM. But I might answer that by saying, suppose I should be struck by lightning while in the service, does it follow that therefore I must be promoted?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I have put the case of a private, but if it were the case of a general I suppose the gentleman would vote in favor of it?

Mr. BRUMM. There must be some merit, outside of mere accident, to induce me to pass a special bill of this kind. And I want to say that I am not one of the great admirers of Sunday soldiers or parade soldiers. I do not see the absolute necessity of these soldiers who figure in time of peace. I believe in those who are soldiers when soldiers are wanted.

Mr. NORTHWAY. This man was a soldier.

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly the gentleman is not asking the passage of this measure in consequence of the two years' military service which this man rendered. To ask that would be simply outrageous. I do not care what horn of the dilemma the gentleman may take. This man was only enlisted for two years; and surely the gentleman from Ohio would not ask to promote a private from the position of hospital steward to that of a lieutenant of cavalry in consideration of two years' service thirty-five years ago. Why, sir, there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of cases more meritorious than this.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, if I understand this proposition, it is to retire a hospital steward and make him a second lieutenant in the Army. If this bill passes, let me say to my friend that I trust, in justice to the sutlers of the Army, he will introduce a bill to put every sutler on the retired list with the rank of a captain at least. If there was any place in the Army (and I appeal to every soldier here, I care not on what side he may have fought) that was sought for by men who wanted to escape the storm of battle and the bullets of the enemy, it was the position of hospital steward. It does seem to me the most absurd proposition I have ever known to come from sensible people, that a man who, although he may have been enlisted, was not a soldier, who mixed pills and perhaps administered them to the soldier, should be retired as a second lieutenant of cavalry when there are thousands of privates who do not receive any such recognition, although they bared their breasts to the storm of battle and are entitled to the respect of their country.

Mr. Chairman, if my friend will introduce a bill to put upon the retired list of the Army the sutlers who plied their trade or vocation and made money—

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MEREDITH. Always, with the kindest courtesy.

Mr. NORTHWAY. You probably live in a section of the country where you may insult men in that way, but here you can not insult men with any hope of success by talking in that manner.

Mr. MEREDITH. My dear sir, when I want to insult a man, and, thank God, I come from a section of the country that entertains a sentiment upon this subject, so that when we, when my people, or any individual desires to insult a man we will do it to his face, not behind his back, and will meet the responsibility wherever or whatever it may be and under whatever circumstances it shall arise.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I will not permit any man to insult the common soldier of the North in that way without calling a halt.

Mr. MEREDITH. I say to you that I am not insulting the common soldier of the North; but, on the contrary, I am upholding the common soldier, the man who won for himself fame and honor on the field of battle; and I say to you that the common soldiers of this country will understand it and stand by me when they find that you are attempting to exalt a hospital steward, a bombproof man, and not a soldier. They are proud of foemen worthy of their steel, but not of men of this class.

Mr. NORTHWAY. You are comparing them to sutlers, and it is an insult to them, and intended as an insult which they will appreciate.

Mr. MEREDITH. I do not care what the gentleman thinks. I repeat that the position of hospital steward is known to every man who served in the Army as the safest, best, and most effective bombproof position that could be found, and I appeal to every man who has ever served in the Army to verify the truth of that assertion.

I say to my friend, then, that you are insulting the private soldiers of the North when you compare their records with that of bombproof men who held positions which did not require them to meet the enemy in any danger, but which permitted them to draw pay for mixing up pills and mixing up medicines and perhaps administering them when the surgeons happened to be absent. If there is an insult, you are the man who is guilty of it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I will take my chance of that kind of an insult.

Mr. MEREDITH. And I will take mine; and you will find, let me say to my friend from Ohio, that I am not a man to undertake to escape any responsibility that attaches to me.

I stand by the private soldiers of this country. If you will introduce a bill to put on the retired list a private soldier who is worthy of the name of soldier, who met the enemy and acted his part as a soldier, I care not on what side he was, I honor and respect him and will vote for your bill. But when you come to put the hospital stewards, the bombproof man, or the sutlers on the retired list of the Army, I shall vote against your bill, because I believe it is an insult to the real soldier who stood by the flag in its hour of danger and faced death on the battlefield.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MEREDITH. I will yield to the gentleman if for a question.

Mr. PARKER. I only wanted to make a suggestion which I possibly can make better after the gentleman has concluded. I beg pardon; I thought he had concluded his remarks.

Mr. MEREDITH. I do not desire to detain the committee. I have expressed my ideas in my own humble way, and what I believe to be a just way, to the interest of what I think to be the real soldiers of the country. I have expressed the opinion that we should not exalt a man who saw nothing of the war and who did not face danger, but who occupied a bombproof position above the real soldiers in that struggle which lasted for four years, and in which my people were engaged on the one side and the people of my friend from Ohio on the other.

I remember that those were momentous times. There is no doubt of that. But, Mr. Chairman, when the history of that struggle shall be written by the impartial historian, when the writer can rise above all party feelings, party prejudice, or sectional animosities, and relate the history of that war, the history as it is written, remembering that when speaking of the honors and glories of the British soldiery the British historian does not stop to inquire whether the man's ancestor fought under the White or the Red Rose, I say when the historian of our common country can write its history without stopping to inquire whether the man wore the Blue or the Gray, but speak of the powers and bravery of the American soldier, I shall be willing to risk my humble position to-day against the proposition of my friend from Ohio, and believe that the real soldier, the true man, will agree with me that we should not exalt the bombproof fellow, the man who was not compelled to bare his bosom to the enemy's bullets, but who held a safe position and suffered, as some gentlemen have said, from sunstroke and not from a saber stroke. I am for the man, sir, who suffered the saber stroke and not the sunstroke, and when my friend from Ohio shall present a bill asking that some gentleman who is a private or has special reasons to be put into a position to be retired as a second lieutenant of cavalry, if he was a true soldier I would vote for that bill, but not for the bombproof man and not for such a man as my friend from Ohio has selected in this case, not a soldier, but a "pill roller," if I may so express it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask members to attend to the facts in this case. This man was an enlisted soldier; whether as private for two years or as hospital steward, he was an enlisted man in the Army, doing the duty of a soldier. He was and is a special man in habits, demeanor, and earnest disposition to do his duty, and I do not resent, because I know gentlemen on the other side would withdraw their attacks on "bombproof men" and "pill rollers" if they saw this man.

There is one principle embodied in the general law of the United States, that the enlisted man, in peace as well as in war, shall have a chance at promotion. We examine and promote privates in the Army to be corporals, sergeants, lieutenants, and captains; and there is no man in any other branch of the Army service of the United States who would not have had his promotion long ago, in time of peace, had he possessed the ability and devotion of this man. He, however, is in the Hospital Corps, where there is no opportunity afforded for promotion by general law.

What remedy is there? By general law you only promote the best, only the special instances, in the Army. Here there is no general law. I object to special bills where there is any general relief; but here there is none. Here the committee thought that there was a reason for the exception that I make to the rule that special laws shall not be passed as to the Army. Here we found a man who was fit to be an officer, who ought long ago to have been made an officer, who was a veteran of the war, and who in his old days should be put upon the retired list with what rank he would have got if there had been any general rule for his branch of the service. Now, if we are wrong, say so. If the House says it will not adopt any special bill even in such a case, very well. But I could not, even after all the debate, keep my place and allow the debate to run on into an attack upon the character of the man, who is a veteran, patriot, scientific man, and I can not avoid rising to express my feeling with reference to the matter.

Mr. MAHON rose.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania wishes to ask me a question?

Mr. MAHON. I do not want to consume the time of this House in discussing this bill, but this is the second day we have had this private bill under consideration—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was only recognized to ask a question.

Mr. MAHON. I will not stop to debate the bill, but I will move that it be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. MAHON. I hope some gentleman will make that motion.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the country has recognized that when men have bared their breasts in battle, when they have been subjected to the chance of being shot down in their prime, that they shall be pensioned, that they shall be considered as a special class; but there is nothing whatever in this case that puts this man in that special class, so far as is developed thus far. I have had in my employ, for forty years, from 300 to 1,000 men. Nine in ten of them have served their country as faithfully as this man, and in as dangerous positions as this man, for aught that appears in this discussion, and deserve to be pensioned as much as this man, for aught that appears in this discussion. Why should they be taxed—for they are the men who pay these pensions—why should they be taxed to pension this man? I have known in my lifetime scores of educated men, college men, specialists, who have worked all their lives for an income less than this man has had, and they have served their country as well, for aught that appears here.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the point—

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Well, what is the point?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. The assertion has been made here that this man is a specialist. I wish the gentleman would call the attention of the committee to the fact that Dr. O'Reilly recommends, not that he be retired, but that he be given a position at a certain salary per month, on account of his special services.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be diverted from the line of my argument. I want to say that this is, to use a slang expression, "running the thing into the ground." There is no excuse for it. There is no justification for it. Admitting that he was a faithful man, that he served his country, and all the things that he did, nine men in ten in this country ought to be pensioned upon the same principle if he deserves to be pensioned.

Mr. NORTHWAY. He is not asking a pension.

A MEMBER. He is getting something better than a pension.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to you that I never yet saw the men in my employ coming up to get their pay that I did not regret that their pay was not higher. That is the fact of it; and when there is any opportunity for a right-minded man who employs other men to put up their wages he will do it. It ought to be done by special act of Congress, if this ought to be done.

Let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the life of every man, with few exceptions, is by turns a poem or a tragedy, just as you look at it, from day to day. We can bring in the case of any man here and make a plea which touches the sympathy of men to put him on the pension roll; but let me say, in closing, that this case is put in here under the peculiar circumstances which exist here, in order that justice shall not be done by men who are being robbed in their just claims not being considered by the Government of the United States, their just claims which have been reported favorably and unanimously by the committee to whom this day is assigned.

This bill was put in here to be kept here, and be discussed the day out, so that women may still continue to haunt the halls of Congress in the hope that it will deal justly with their father's and husband's private claims to money honestly due them. It is an outrage and a disgrace for this House and the leaders to put in such claims as this, to be discussed all day, so that these other claims shall not be considered.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I am through.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to enter my protest, along with the protest of other gentlemen, against the passage of this measure. I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat that this and similar bills are outrages, especially against the common soldiers of this country. I should have been glad had the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] resented this as an insult to the soldiers and denounced this bill instead of advocating it, instead of stating that the gentleman from Virginia was insulting the common soldiers by classing this man along with the sutlers, camp followers, bounty jumpers, and coffee coolers. I am glad to see a revival going on among gentlemen on the other side of this House. I am glad to see that the scales have been stricken from their eyes and they have begun to see the injustice that is being done to the common soldier; that they have begun to see the outrages that are being perpetrated upon the taxpayers of this country.

This House, like a greyhound, Mr. Chairman, is hurrying in the passage of bills granting pensions and emoluments which are as unmeritorious and undeserving as this one is. So far as I am concerned, I feel it my duty to raise my voice and enter my protest against the passage of all such measures as this, and I shall vote against it; and then, if the majority of this House see proper to pass it, let them do so and take the responsibility. It will only add another disadvantage to their record and reputation before the people.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that they have been doing just such things as this from the time the Fifty-fourth Congress first met. It seems to me that they are making a specialty of unmeritorious and undeserving claims—for photographers, men who have gone out for their own profit and benefit to take pictures, and giving such men pensions, removing charges of desertion, pensioning bounty jumpers and coffee coolers, and making special pleas for such parties instead of putting them in the background and bringing to the front the claims of the common soldiers, like those distinguished veterans who stood here this morning with that old flag, those men who first enlisted, who went out when the call for troops was made.

I submit, sir, that I do protest against this discrimination. Why is it that they should look over this Calendar, which has on it many just and meritorious claims, and make a special plea and bring up this bill, which proposes to raise a hospital steward, a "hospital rat," as you may call him, and promote him to the rank of a lieutenant in the cavalry, in utter disregard of the men who went forward and bared their breasts to the storm of bullets in battle? Why is it, sir, that you can not take up the case of some distinguished private soldier who performed distinguished services upon the battlefield and raise him and make him a lieutenant instead of going into the hospital, going into the bombproof positions, going into the places where the men did not smell powder, and leaving out of consideration the men on the tented field and on the bloody field of battle, the men who met the storm night and day? Why, it is an insult to the common soldiers of this country; and I say, sir, that such bills as this rob and plunder the public Treasury without any right or without any deserts at all. It is looting the Treasury for men who do not deserve that which you ask to give them.

I shall vote against this bill, and I hope that the gentlemen on the other side of this House will see that this bill is snowed under by an overwhelming majority of votes as a just rebuke to that class of members of this House who continually stand up here and hypocritically pretend to be the friend of the soldier, the common soldier, and all the time robbing him for the benefit of officers and officers' wives, for photographers, camp followers, bounty jumpers, deserters, and hospital rats, as these men are. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. NORTHWAY. What is the amendment?

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend lines 6 and 7 by striking out the words "and directed"; so as to make it read: "The President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint said Frank M. Marshall," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt.

The question was again taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. FENTON. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 60.

So the motion was rejected.

GEORGE CASE.

The first business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2740) to carry into effect a finding of the Court of Claims in favor of the estate of George Case, late of Independence County, Ark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims having found that George Case, late of Independence County, Ark., was loyal to the United States throughout the late war, and that military stores and supplies of the value of $475 were taken from him in said county, by and for the use of the Federal Army, and not paid for, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay said sum, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the legal representatives of said George Case.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the report in that case read.

The report (by Mr. LESTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2740) for the relief of George Case, deceased, respectfully report:

The Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress referred the above-mentioned claim to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the Bowman Act.

The claim has been returned to the committee by the court with the following findings of fact:

[Court of Claims. Congressional, No. 575. Sarah Case, administratrix, vs. The United States.]

This case, being a claim for supplies or stores alleged to have been taken by or furnished to the military forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the court, on a preliminary inquiry, finds that George Case (since deceased), the person alleged to have furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same are alleged to have been taken, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war.

BY THE COURT.

Filed April 29, 1890.

[Court of Claims. No. 575. Sarah Case, administratrix of George Case, deceased, vs. United States.]

STATEMENT OF CASE.

The claim in the above-entitled case for supplies or stores, alleged to have been taken by or furnished to the military forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, was transmitted to the court by the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives on the 4th day of March, 1886.

Mr. R. A. Borton, esq., appeared for claimant, and the Attorney-General, by Felix Brannigan, esq., his assistant, and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

On a preliminary inquiry the court, on the 29th day of April, 1889, found that the person alleged to have furnished the supplies or stores, or from whom they were alleged to have been taken, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war.

The case was brought to a hearing on its merits on the 14th day of February, 1894. The claimant in her petition makes the following allegations:

That during the war there was taken from the intestate the following stores and supplies of the value stated and of which he was the owner, to wit:

1 mule	$150.00
2 mules	300.00
2 wagons	250.00
1 set double harness	40.00
1 platform scales	40.00
2 pairs counter scales	24.00
6 pairs harness hames	7.50

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDING OF FACT.

There were taken from the claimant's intestate, near Batesville, Ark., as alleged in the petition, during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, by military authority for the use of the Army, quartermaster stores the reasonable value of which at the time and place of taking was $475.

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Your committee report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. LESTER. Mr. Chairman, I have no further connection with this bill than that which arises from being directed by the Committee on War Claims to report it favorably to the House. The facts are set forth in the report. The claim was referred to the Court of Claims, and the court found as a jurisdictional fact, first, the loyalty of the claimant, and second, the fact that the stores and supplies taken for the Army amounted to $475. Thereupon the court gave judgment as far as they could, and reported their finding to Congress. The question now is simply whether Congress will appropriate money to pay the claim which has been thus adjudicated by the court. I ask that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as this is similar to many other cases, I desire to ask for information how it happens that in cases of this kind where supplies were taken for which, I suppose, proper receipts were given, payment has not been made in the regular way—on the presumption that the claimant was a loyal man?

Mr. LESTER. Will the gentleman explain a little further what he means by the regular way?

Mr. DINGLEY. By application to the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. LESTER. The Quartermaster-General does not pay claims of this character. They can not be paid in that department.

Mr. DINGLEY. Was not a receipt given for this property, the man being loyal?

Mr. LESTER. They say not. There is a class of claims which the Quartermaster-General can pay, and another class that he can not pay, and this is one of the latter class.

Mr. DINGLEY. But these facts having been judicially ascertained, there would seem to be no doubt as to the propriety of payment unless some things may have transpired which in the lapse of time have prevented the court from obtaining evidence that it might otherwise have obtained.

Mr. LESTER. This is one of the class of claims referred to the Court of Claims to be adjudicated, and it has been adjudicated by the court and reported to Congress for payment.

Mr. DINGLEY. As I understand the matter, these cases are considered by the court with reference to three essential facts. The first fact to be found is that the man was loyal; the second is that the supplies and stores were furnished to the Union Army; and the third is that the claimant has not been paid. I understand that those three facts have been ascertained by the court in this case.

Mr. LESTER. Yes, sir. The question of loyalty is a jurisdictional fact, I will state to the gentleman.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not see any objection to the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER COOK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2741) for the relief of Peter Cook, of Arkansas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Peter Cook, of Lonoke County, Ark., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $904, being the amount found by the Court of Claims to be due to him as a loyal citizen for stores and supplies taken and used by the Federal Army during the late war.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. NEILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2741) for the relief of Peter Cook, respectfully report:

The Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, to whom was referred the claim of Peter Cook, of Lonoke County, Ark., not being fully and clearly advised of all the facts in said claim, referred the same to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, and generally known as the Bowman Act.

The claim has been returned to said committee by the court with findings of fact.

Your committee recommend that said findings of the Court of Claims be carried out by the passage of the bill, which is in harmony with the conclusions reached by the court, and ask that said findings be printed as a part of this report.

Your committee attach hereto the act of Congress generally known as the Bowman Act and the decisions of the Court of Claims construing said act, and ask that they be printed as an appendix to this report.

[Court of Claims. Congressional, No. 230. Peter Cook vs. The United States.]

This case being a claim for supplies or stores alleged to have been taken by or furnished to the military forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the court, on a preliminary inquiry, finds that said Peter Cook, the person alleged to have furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same are alleged to have been taken, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war.

STATEMENT OF CASE.

The claim in the above-entitled case, for supplies or stores alleged to have been taken by or furnished to the military forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, was transmitted to the court by the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives on the 23d day of January, 1885.

J. W. Smith, esq., appeared for claimant, and the Attorney-General, by William J. Randall, esq., his assistant, and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

On a preliminary inquiry the court found that the person alleged to have furnished the supplies or stores, or from whom they were alleged to have been taken, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war.

The case was brought to a hearing on its merits on the 4th day of January, 1889. The claimant in his petition makes the following allegation:

That he is a citizen of the United States, residing in Lonoke County, State of Arkansas, where he resided during the late war of the rebellion.

That the following stores and supplies were taken from him in the years 1863 and 1864 for the use of the United States Army:

800 bushels of corn, at $1.....	$800
22,500 pounds live pork, at 10 cents.....	2,250
14,400 pounds beef, at 5 cents.....	720
4 horses, at $150.....	600
1 mule.....	175
18 head of fat sheep, at $9.....	162
4,000 bundles sheaf oats, at 4 cents.....	160
100 bushels sweet potatoes, at $1.....	100
Total.....	4,830

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDING OF FACT:

There was taken from the claimant, from his farm in Lonoke County, Ark., during the years 1863 and 1864, by military authority, for the use of the Army, stores and supplies of the kind above described, the reasonable value of which at the time and place of taking was $904.

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, with reference to this character of claims, to state the probable amount of them.

Mr. MAHON. I can answer that in a general way. If I had my report I could tell more definitely. All the findings of the Court of Claims were paid up to and including the Fifty-first Congress. The Fifty-second and the Fifty-third Congress refused to pay any of the findings of that court. The consequence is that those findings have accumulated until now we have about $700,000 of them in the committee room. We have reported about $600,000 of such claims. That includes those in the omnibus bill. The committee reported some three or four individual bills, but afterwards they reported the omnibus bill and then stopped. You will not find any more of these individual bills on the Calendar after the omnibus bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. The claims reported amount to about $600,000?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the committee satisfied of the justice of those claims and that they ought to be paid?

Mr. MAHON. The Congress of the United States, to relieve itself of the waste of time and the annoyance of investigating these claims—in fact Congress could not investigate them properly—passed what are known as the Tucker Act and the Bowman Act, which are familiar to most of the older members of the House. The Bowman Act applied to claims for stores and supplies furnished to the United States Army. The Tucker Act applied to claims for property taken and destroyed for military purposes. Congress established the Court of Claims and sent all of those claimants to that court. Every claimant in the Court of Claims has to establish as a first step, in order to give the court jurisdiction, his loyalty. If any claimant fails to establish the fact that he was loyal, the court thereupon declines jurisdiction of the case. The loyalty of the claimant being established, he then has to prove by undoubted evidence that the property was furnished to the United States Army, and also what its value was. Then the court, after examining and making a finding of fact, reports in each case its finding to Congress, so that appropriation may be made for payment.

I want to say this about the Court of Claims: From my investigation of the matter I am satisfied—and I believe that every member of the House who has any knowledge of the subject will agree with me—that this court holds claimants to a stricter accountability, a stricter compliance with the rules of evidence than any other court in the United States. In proof of this assertion I cite the fact that the court, since its establishment, has allowed only 84 per cent of the claims presented to it for consideration. Take this case as an illustration. This man alleges that he furnished supplies to the value of $4,850. He gives an itemized statement of the goods which he furnished, but the court, after close scrutiny and after finding that he was loyal, allowed him but $904.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Without interest?

Mr. MAHON. Without interest. And that illustrates the history of all these claims.

Mr. RAY. Did this gentleman have any proof that he had furnished these articles? Had he any receipt from any officer or officers of the Government?

Mr. MAHON. I do not know anything about that; but a court established by the Congress of the United States, composed of five as good lawyers as there are in the country, have found the facts. I do not know anything about them myself, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] can rest assured that if this claimant had not produced evidence entirely satisfactory to the court that these goods had been furnished he never would have obtained a finding.

Mr. RAY. Does the gentleman know how many times this claim has been presented to Congress and reported upon?

Mr. MAHON. I do not know. I believe it was first reported to Congress as late as 1893.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not interested in any of these bills. I have not one constituent who has a claim of this kind before the House; but having examined the work of this court, I repeat my statement that the court, since its establishment, has allowed only 84 per cent of all the claims filed. Up to and including the Fifty-first Congress this court had such a standing here that Congress paid every claim of this kind that the court found due. But the Democratic party, when it came into power in the Fifty-second and the Fifty-third Congresses, stopped for some reason or other the payment of these claims. It may have been for lack of money in the Treasury or it may have been a matter of party policy. I do not pretend to state the reason. But, sir, this House ought to do one of two things—either it ought to pay the findings of this court or it ought to abolish the court. Sir, a man 85 years old called at my office yesterday. He had prosecuted a claim through the Court of Claims, and had secured a finding in his favor for $1,500. In order to secure that finding he had mortgaged his little property worth $500 and spent every dollar of the proceeds in the prosecution of his claim. Now, why should not this Congress pay that claim and others of the same class?

This is your court. Congress established it for the express purpose of ascertaining in cases of this kind whether a claimant was loyal, whether the goods were furnished to the Army, and whether the price asked was just and reasonable. When the court finds those facts in any case there is, as the Supreme Court has held, only one thing for Congress to do; that is to appropriate the money to pay such judgments. If I had time I could cite decisions of the Supreme Court recently delivered commending the Court of Claims in the highest terms for its examination of these claims.

Here is this claim now before us. Congress referred it to the Court of Claims. The claimant employed counsel. He brought his witnesses a considerable distance to the city of Washington. This was necessary because depositions are not accepted; the witnesses must be examined here. His claim amounted to $4,900. The court allowed him a little over $900. Probably it has cost him that much to get a judgment. The only question is whether you are going to pay him or not. There is no controversy about the facts. The simple question is whether this House proposes to pay findings of the Court of Claims in cases of this kind or whether it proposes to pay no attention to them. I say, either you ought to stand by the court and pay the judgments which it renders or you should abolish your courts and save the hundreds of thousands of dollars that are now expended in the investigation of these cases.

I have found many members of Congress opposed to the passage of bills of this kind; that has been my experience. But, sir, I come from a county that 200,000 marching men crossed and recrossed in the years from 1861 to 1865. My people and I know what war was; and I want to say to these gentlemen from the West who did not live in the seat of war that these claims are meritorious and ought to be paid.

Why should not the Government of the United States pay to its citizens what it owes them? But it seems to have become a rule in Congress that if a private citizen has an honest and just claim against the Government of the United States he may knock at these doors in vain. Sir, I would sooner that a pauper owed me a thousand dollars than that the Government of the United States should be my debtor to that amount.

A MEMBER. You would get paid sooner.

Mr. MAHON. My experience has been that the greatest robber in this country is the nation itself.

A MEMBER. You are right.

Mr. MAHON. Our Government is continually robbing private citizens of their property and refusing to reimburse them. Let us have small appropriations, if need be, for rivers and harbors; let us appropriate less money, if need be, for our great Printing Office, on which we spend $2,000,000 a year. And let us pay these men who have proven their claims in a court of competent jurisdiction; who have shown that they were loyal, that they furnished these stores and supplies to the Army, and that the price they ask for them is just and honest. I repeat, if you do not propose to pay claims of this kind abolish your court. The time has come for us to decide whether we are to pay these claims or not. If Congress refuses to pay claims of this kind I am ready to vote to abolish the Court of Claims, although my own district is full of people having claims of this kind. But I have not brought one such claim here.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a single word further. I am a Northern man, with all the sympathies and all of the feelings that a man could have for his section of country. But to my friends from the North, and to these people from the South, let me say that a man who was loyal to this Government in the South during that struggle—and members of the Committee on War Claims fully understand that—I say a man who was loyal in the South at that time was placed at an unusual disadvantage. It was not an easy thing for a man to be loyal there, while up here he could not well have been otherwise.

Mr. EVANS. And let me suggest to the gentleman that it was a very easy thing, when the quartermaster issued his vouchers, to get his pay; but it was a very different thing in the South.

Mr. MAHON (continuing). The man who remained loyal to the Government in the South, I say, was entitled to as much consideration as the people in the North, who could not have been disloyal even if they wanted to. These are the people, both in the North and in the South, who come up here and present their claims to this court for adjudication. It is not only the people of Alabama and Kentucky and Tennessee who bring these claims, but we have claims from New York and Pennsylvania; in fact, there is scarcely a State in the Union from which they do not come.

Mr. WILLIS. No matter where they come from, if they are honest and just they ought to be paid.

Mr. MAHON. The gentlemen who take a position contrary to the payment of these claims tell us that the aggregate of them will run up into the hundreds or millions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, there never was a wilder statement. Laying the cotton claims aside—and you all know what they mean, cotton captured and turned over to the Government—I venture to assert now, without any fear of successful contradiction, knowing what I speak of, for I have had occasion to examine the matter very fully, that the maximum covered by these claims will not exceed $20,000,000, and the wildest estimate of the amount required to wipe them all out will not go beyond that. Pay $20,000,000 toward these claims and you would never hear of them again.

Now, Congress passed a bill the other day appropriating $60,000,000—

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HICKS. Do I understand my colleague to say that twenty millions will cover these claims?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. BRUMM. Does that include the border State claims?

Mr. MAHON. It includes all of the claims before the Court of Claims—all of them.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand the gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, to express himself in favor of paying the cotton claims?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir; I am talking simply now of property given to the United States Army or taken by it from loyal people. Why, Mr. Chairman, hundreds of men in this country, both North and South, who were in the Army know that under the direction of generals or officers commanding United States forces they occupied storehouses, took them with their contents, kept a military force in control of them, and, when pressed by the Confederate forces to depart, put a match to the buildings and blew them out of existence. Ought not the Government to pay for such property as that?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I understood him to say that twenty millions will cover the extreme maximum of the war claims before the Court of Claims—

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that if the appropriation of $20,000,000 was allowed, that is to say, the proportion that has been allowed under similar circumstances heretofore, that it would only reach about 8 per cent?

Mr. MAHON (interrupting). I am talking of this, if the gentleman will permit me. These claims had been paid up to the Fifty-first Congress. That Congress passed what is known as an omnibus bill, which carried in round numbers $800,000 of these claims. That appropriation cleaned up the findings of the court up to that Congress. Now, including the Fifty-second Congress, if that Congress had passed a bill paying the findings of the court up to that date, it would have amounted to only about $840,000 more. Then take the Fifty-third Congress. The findings up to that time which had been reported to Congress amounted to about $320,000. No provision was made for payment there, so that now this omnibus bill reported to this House carries $587,000. That, as I have already said, embraces all of the findings of the court up to this time and will wipe up the whole business, if that bill passes, up to this date. That is to say, $500,000 and a little over of appropriations will to-day wipe out the findings that have been made by the Court of Claims.

I will add now another $500,000, and that makes the sum—and there is no possibility of these claims before that court exceeding that sum—appropriated by this Congress; allowing one or two hundred thousand for the next session will wipe them out.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The question was with reference to the suggestion of the gentleman about twenty millions covering these claims.

Mr. MAHON. I am coming to that in a moment, as the gentleman will see.

I make the estimate in this manner: When I made that statement I had—of the twenty millions—in mind claims pending before Congress of the State of New York, amounting to some two or two and a half millions or over; another claim from Pennsylvania, embracing in round numbers a sum of about $3,000,000, and some of the other States are also included. Now, some of the best lawyers in this country claim that this Government is not at all responsible for the claims of those States. This House will be asked in the near future to allow the Supreme Court of the United States to pass upon the question and put a construction upon the fourth section of the Constitution of the United States. If the court holds that the General Government is not legally responsible to pay the claims of the States it wipes out about ten or twelve millions of dollars of these claims at once. That would include all of the claims of the States. And so I say of the amounts pending before the Court of Claims, allowing everything possible to come in, $20,000,000 is a wild estimate to wipe them out, and the bugaboo which has been raised about this thing costing hundreds of millions of dollars to the Government is the veriest nonsense. There is nothing in it.

I want to say again, let any member of this House, if he is not satisfied with a finding of the Court of Claims, go down there when they are having an investigation. You will find great care exercised by the Attorney-General and his assistants on behalf of the United States. They are always on hand, and these people are examined and cross-examined and these claims are sifted to the very bottom.

Now, I say the time has come for this Congress either to pay these findings of the Court of Claims or to abolish that court, and let the people of this country know that this Congress does not propose to pay their claims in the future, whether they are found to be just or not. [Applause.] I make this suggestion for this reason: You have a Committee on Claims and a Committee on War Claims. They are like all committees. There is no use in playing Congress. Here you have 17 members of this House plodding night and day through these bills, writing these long and tedious reports, explaining the facts and the law in these cases. These bills that we now have in the Committee on War Claims, these findings of the Court of Claims and other claims, are about 2,100 in number. They do not accumulate. They come in Congress after Congress. The bills are printed and the reports are printed, and if you go and investigate you will find that you have spent about $340,000 in this Congress for printing for this committee and other committees.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, because I have been somewhat interested in his statement, which seems to be something of a new departure on that side. I desire to ask what effort he has made during this Congress to secure consideration of these claims; as I believe, under the rules, under the parliamentary practice of the House, the duty devolves on the chairman of the Committee on Claims or the chairman of the Committee on War Claims to make the usual motion on Friday to go into Committee of the Whole to consider these claims?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. In view of that fact, I desire to know whether the gentleman has made any effort to secure consideration of these claims on Fridays during this Congress?

Mr. MAHON. I have been in this Congress since the beginning of it, and every Friday I have watched for an opportunity to bring up these claims; but either a great appropriation bill or some privileged question has ruled this Calendar out every time.

Mr. DOCKERY. My recollection was that the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar to-day was made by the gentleman from Tennessee, not a member of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to say that the remarks of the gentleman are not a new departure. On the other hand, the proposition to pay these claims has come from that side of the House, and not from this side, and the gentleman from Missouri is wrong when he says that it is a new departure on the part of gentlemen on that side to pay these claims. The people of the South are under obligations to that side of the House for the payment of these claims in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That was an honest Congress.

Mr. MAHON. I said before, and I repeat it, that the findings of the Court of Claims have always been paid by a Republican Congress.

A MEMBER. That is true.

Mr. MAHON. Because my understanding as a Republican is that you can not find any place where the Republican party has undertaken to repudiate honest debts.

Mr. BRUMM. Now, as chairman of the Committee on Claims, I want to answer for the Committee on Claims. The gentlemen on the other side can answer for the Fifty-third Congress and for the Fifty-second Congress—

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, I can not; because I do not think there was any reason.

Mr. BRUMM. As chairman of the Committee on Claims I want to answer the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. So far as I am concerned I do not believe in passing bills and having appropriations made when I know that the other side have robbed the Treasury of every dollar and there is not a dollar there to pay them.

Mr. MAHON. The bills before the gentleman's committee do not as a rule go before the Court of Claims.

Mr. BRUMM. I beg your pardon. The attack was made on my committee as well as on yours.

Mr. MAHON. I am simply defending this course established by a Republican Congress, and I want to reassert that there is no better United States court in the land, that there is no more conscientious court, that there are no findings of any court that are better considered; and the Supreme Court of the United States have held this court in such esteem that in two cases they have refused to review the findings of that court, saying they always found them to be correct. Now, you can pay these claims or not, as you choose.

Mr. HICKS. Have all these claims that have been passed upon and adjudicated by the Court of Claims been reported by your committee?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; they are always reported by the committee.

Mr. COX. Not exactly just in that shape.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is recognized.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I yield thirty minutes of my hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat astonished at the position taken and the remarks made by the chairman of the Committee on War Claims in reference to this claim and these claims. I can well remember, in both the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, standing up here with my Republican colleagues almost solidly and voting against these war claims or any one of them.

These claims are thirty and more years old, worn out in the service, outlawed, and barred by the statute of limitations. They are stale demands, and no court in Christendom would consider them for a moment. They should be allowed to repose. The claimants should not stand at the door of the Treasury constantly demanding admittance. We are borrowing to pay current expenses. Let us look forward and exercise due diligence in protecting the Government of the United States.

I remember that the action referred to was taken either in the last Congress or in the Fifty-second Congress, under the lead of a Representative from Michigan, now a Senator of the United States—Mr. BURROWS—and he gave us the figures showing the enormous sum these claims amounted to; showing a most appalling condition of affairs should the Congress of the United States enter upon the policy of even attempting to pay them, and after he had made that presentation of facts—

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. What did he say it was?

Mr. RAY. I have forgotten.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Five or six hundred million dollars?

Mr. RAY. I think it was at least $600,000,000; possibly more.

Mr. MAHON. Not without including the cotton claims.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Did not that include not the findings of the Court of Claims, but the claimant's own figures?

Mr. RAY. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. He went to the Department for those figures?

Mr. NORTHWAY. He got the bills here.

Mr. RAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to answer all questions upon this subject. This is a business, common-sense matter, and it is one where people should not let their generosity run away with their reason. I think the gross amount is over $600,000,000. Now, I myself assisted Mr. BURROWS in looking up these claims.

Mr. BRUMM. What claims do you refer to?

Mr. RAY. The war claims presented in the Fifty-second or Fifty-third Congress. I think it was the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. BRUMM. You simply took the bills that were presented?

Mr. RAY. We took the bills presented, and those bills presented, which amounted to over $600,000,000, were like this bill brought in here to-day, simply "feelers."

Mr. MAHON. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RAY. Pass this bill to-day, and you will have opened the door for raids upon the Treasury of the United States that will keep this Administration selling bonds while it exists, and it will keep the next Administration selling bonds from the very day it enters the White House.

Mr. BRUMM. I do not believe that. The next Administration will provide money to pay its obligations. It is going to be a Republican Administration.

Mr. RAY. That is all right. How shall we provide money? We can not do it by import duties. If we should undertake to do that, there would be no more imports from foreign countries; and if you undertake to tax the people of the United States to do it, there would not be any money left in the pockets of the people at the time you get through. You would simply transfer money from the pockets of those who have money to the pockets of those who are making claims. We can increase import duties to a certain point, but a time may come when excessive duties will prohibit all importations.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. RAY. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Have you ever made an estimate of how many dollars the Court of Claims have found to be owing by the United States?

Mr. RAY. I have not.

Mr. COX. Have you a suspicion of how much it is?

Mr. RAY. I think the gentleman here [Mr. MAHON] stated the amount.

Mr. COX. Do you think he stated it correctly?

Mr. RAY. Why, certainly.

Mr. COX. Why, then, after you have got the Court of Claims to pass upon these claims and pronounce them just, ought they not to be paid?

Mr. RAY. The Court of Claims does not seem to pass upon and pronounce them just. They seem to pronounce upon the questions whether the property was had and the claimant loyal.

Mr. COX. Oh, well, my dear sir, there is no claim that goes to the Court of Claims for supplies furnished during the war unless the fact is first determined that the party was loyal. That is a jurisdictional fact.

Mr. RAY. I understand that perfectly well. The gentleman seems to think I do not know anything on that subject.

Mr. COX. I think you know it all.

Mr. RAY. Oh, no; I do not know it all, because if I did I should be more opposed to these bills than I am; but I know enough about it. Without proof of loyalty no claim can be allowed.

Mr. LEWIS. Will you allow me to ask you a question?

Mr. RAY. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Does not the Constitution provide that private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation being made therefor?

Mr. RAY. That is true.

Mr. LEWIS. How can there ever be a claim for property that the Government got and used without paying for it and the proof of that fact made, and then escape a violation of the Constitution, which all members of this House are sworn to support. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RAY. I want to say to my colleague, for whom I have the highest respect, who is a good lawyer, an admirable man, and a gentleman, I want to say that I would not oppose the payment of any claim against the Government of the United States were I thoroughly satisfied that private property had been taken for public use from a loyal citizen of this Government, and were I further satisfied that no just compensation has been made. If these matters of fact were established to my satisfaction I would vote to pay the claim every time.

Mr. LEWIS. Is there not a Court of Claims of the United States, established by law for the purpose of investigating, ascertaining, and deciding these claims, and has not that court certified this claim and others to Congress for payment? Everybody knows that such is the fact. And yet for years no appropriation has been made to pay these claims. I stand here to say, representing my people, many of whom were loyal to the Union and stood by the Government through all the trials and perils of the war, people to whom the Government of the United States, by the solemn judgment of its own court, owes this money, but whom the Congress of the United States has failed or refused to pay. I stand here to say on behalf of those people that that is repudiation. [Applause.] I say you have no more right to refuse to appropriate money to pay these claims when the court has declared them to be just than you have to refuse to appropriate money to pay the interest on the public debt, to pay the interest on those gold bonds that have been recently issued and sold by the Administration. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, that was quite a long "question," and I do not know that I fully comprehend it, but there was one statement or assumption of fact in it that I deny most emphatically. The gentleman assumes that these findings of the Court of Claims are judgments against the Government of the United States. Now, I have not time this afternoon to go fully into that question, but I assert that they are not judgments in any sense of the word.

Mr. MAHON. They are findings.

Mr. RAY. They are findings of fact only, a mere expression of opinion, and I thank the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] for handing me the Bowman Act. That act provides in section 1 as follows:

When the facts shall be found the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee—

That means the committee of the House which sent the claim to the court—or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. RAY. Yes; but I shall want a little more time, because a good deal of my time has been used in answering questions.

Mr. MAHON. Do you not know that the finding of the court is a finding of all the facts? That is what Congress established the court for, to find all the facts, to find whether the man was loyal or disloyal, whether the property was taken, and if taken, what was its value. It is the same as where a court sends a case to an auditor to ascertain certain facts. The gentleman knows that in such a case, when the auditor finds certain facts, the law will not allow the court to ignore those facts.

Mr. RAY. I know the contrary, so far as New York and other States are concerned. I know full well what the old chancery practice was. It was this: The judge would send a case out for a finding of facts for the information of the court; then, the facts being reported to the court, the court would, in its discretion, determine whether the finding should be adopted as the finding of the court as to facts or not. The court always reserved the right to reject such finding. That is the rule wherever the old chancery practice prevails. That is the rule in the District of Columbia. That is the rule in the United States courts, and every good lawyer knows it. So to-day in the State of New York judges very frequently send to a referee certain questions of fact for him to examine and report to the court. That is common in divorce cases and in matters involving long accounts. But the court is never bound by the finding of the referee. The court looks into the evidence, which must be reduced to writing and reported to the court. The court looks into the evidence, and if it finds that the referee has found the facts in accordance with the evidence it confirms and approves his report, or it changes his finding, affirming it in part and rejecting it in part.

Mr. MAHON. Well, your referee has found that this claimant is a loyal man, that he furnished this property to the Government, and that the property was worth all that he asks for it. Now, if you can not find something in the evidence in this case to show that your referee erred you are bound by his finding. If you have ascertained that he did not find the facts as they are, that is one thing, but if he did find the facts correctly, then you can not turn his finding down. That is the law in every State of the Union.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to enter my solemn protest against the charge which has been made against the Government of the United States by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is the greatest robber on the face of this earth.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire and several other members. True.

Mr. RAY. I am exceedingly sorry, Mr. Chairman, to hear representatives of the people in this Republican Congress say that that is true.

Mr. MAHANY. So it is true in these cases.

Mr. RAY. Well, the gentleman does not need to say that more than 500 times. He can not make it true by mere vociferation. [Laughter.] As a representative of the American people, respecting, admiring, loving the Constitution and the Government of the United States and the flag under which we all live, I protest against that statement. We represent the people. The people are honest and will pay every just claim.

Mr. MAHANY. What about the honor of the United States?

Mr. RAY. My dear sir, the honor of the United States, as a nation, is unsullied. We deserve and command the respect of the civilized world.

Mr. MAHANY. Is not the honor of the United States involved in the payment of its debts?

Mr. RAY. Yes, sir; but the representatives of the people have a right to say what are its debts, and I have a right, as representing a portion of the people of the great State of New York, to stand here and say whether a claim against the United States has been established to my satisfaction or not.

This Court of Claims can not bind my judgment or my conscience. I am my own judge. I follow no man's dictation. The hope of getting my claim through will not vary my action in any other bill. New York wants $2,000,000. If her claim is just I will support it, but I will not aid a general raid on the pork barrel for the sake of one small piece of the contents.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I want to say deliberately—deliberately—that no robbers ever built castles on the Rhine to rob the commerce of the Rhine and the merchants that transacted their business up and down the Rhine—any more than the Government of the United States robs its honest creditors here in this House. I say that on my responsibility as a member. I say that the leaders of this House in every Congress in which I have been a member, Democratic and Republican alike, have put in measures here to debate them and to use up the time, to use up the days assigned for the consideration of private claims, so that those claims could not be brought before Congress to be honestly and promptly determined. And that is the object this afternoon. That, I want to say, is the reason why we have such peculiar rulings from the Chair. [Laughter.]

The attempted distinction drawn here between the "findings" and the "judgments" of the Court of Claims is simply paltering with the honest creditors of this country. Why are not the findings of that court equivalent to its judgments? The court was established to do justice, if it was established for any good purpose whatever. Was it established that the citizens of this country might spend their money and wear out their lives before that court for nothing, or was it established to do justice? The findings of that court, it has been said here by an eminent lawyer from Vermont, are the same as the findings of a jury, that may be set aside by the judge, if the judge determines that they are not according to the law and the evidence. But, sir, the presumption is in favor of the findings.

More than that, sir, I say that there ought to be an excuse sought—yea, an excuse sought—any excuse justified in law and justice—to pay the loyal men at the South rather than that they be robbed. [Applause.] We are sending $150,000,000 into the Northern States in pensions, and justly, to fructify the Northern country, to make honorable the lives of the old soldiers, to help educate their children, to lift them to a higher plane. Thank God that we have an excuse for doing it! Even if they were not old soldiers, I hope we might find some justifiable excuse. Oh, that we might find some excuse to do the same with the men—honest, but misguided—who fought those soldiers of the North! In that case the whole South would blossom like the rose instead of being what it is to-day.

Here come these claims, such as that now presented. Let us pay them. [Applause.] Pay them! Do not talk to me about its costing $30,000,000, or $100,000,000, or $600,000,000. Do not talk to me about its costing $2,000,000,000. Do not talk to me about its costing $2,700,000,000. Whatever may be the amount of these debts due by the Government arising out of the war, if they be just, let us pay them. Pay them if they are honestly due. You can not terrify me by making me look in the face the aggregate amount of an honest claim. The man who when an honest claim is presented to him sits down and asks, "How much does this claim amount to?" rather than "Do I honestly owe it?" is a thief. That is all there is about it. [Cries of "Good!" "Good!"] He is looking for his price in order to steal. That is what he is doing. He is looking, I repeat, to see how much he shall be paid for the theft.

I have a claim on this Calendar. It was passed by the Senate twice. It was fought through the Committee on Claims. The claimant had a patent for a cartridge. The Government robbed him of it, and made those cartridges without paying him. He got his claim through the Court of Claims. It cost twenty or thirty thousand dollars to contest it. The first man who presented that claim has failed, the second man has failed, the third man has failed, and died. His heirs are now pressing this claim. When the Speaker of the last two Congresses was asked to recognize a member to bring up that claim—not the present Speaker, for he has not yet been asked—but when the Speaker in Republican and in Democratic Congresses has been asked to recognize a member to bring up such bills, his first question has been, "How much is it?" not "Ought it to be paid?" not "Has it been passed on by the court?" Oh, no; but "How much is it?"

Then again, when Congress is adjourned miserable Democrats go round the country talking about "a billion-dollar Congress." A billion-dollar Congress! The question is not whether Congress was honest, not whether it passed claims which were honestly due, but it is cursed as "a billion-dollar Congress." We know even the tone of voice in which it is said, for we have heard that said here on this floor as well as elsewhere. And, sir, when Republicans get into power and do not pay the honest debts of the Government, they become thieves and robbers, as Congressmen, in the interest of their party, as do the Democrats, though they are honest men individually. [Applause.] Then Republicans go round and shout, "Billion-dollar Congress. Billion-dollar Congress!" as Democrats as Democrats do to Republicans.

Sir, the Senator from Maryland, when he stood up in the Senate in the Fifty-second Congress and said that the Democratic Congress would be obliged to exceed the appropriations of the Republican Congress, would have to go beyond $1,035,000,000—whatever may have been said of that Senator before, my heart warmed toward him and I said, "Those are the bravest words under the circumstances that have been uttered in ten years in either House by Republican or Democrat."

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, shall we pay the honest debts of this Government, or shall we cheat and rob these widows and orphans? Shall we pay the honest, loyal men of the South or shall we continue to rob them? We can never—no, never—grant pensions to their soldiers. But let us, for God's sake, pay their claims, that money may be sent into that country to fructify it and do it good, pay the money honestly due to men at the South who were loyal to the Government in its day of trial—who were robbed of their property in the name of liberty, and who are now denied justice for miserable, contemptible, partisan reasons. [Loud applause.]

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, while I know nothing whatever of the facts involved in the particular bill that we are now considering, yet I am informed that a competent court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter has passed upon the facts presented—of the loyalty of the claimant in the first place, the property taken, and its reasonable worth, and have certified it at about $900. I take it, therefore, that it is a claim that is just and one that should be paid. I am not like my friend from New York [Mr. RAY]; I am not ready to hide behind a technicality or claim that the court did not render or had not power to render a judgment. It is empowered to find the facts in the case, and they are facts that will not be disputed as such, whether they be embodied in the form of a judgment or not. They are required to find upon the facts presented and make a report to the committee of this House. That they have done.

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose to speak not so much of the pending bill in particular, but of the principle which is involved in it, because, coming from the South—having been there born and raised, my people having lived there for a hundred years—all that I have or expect to have being in the South, I thought it proper that I might claim the attention of the committee but for a few moments to submit for your consideration the views entertained by the thousands of Union people in the South as to what the Government should do with reference to claims of this character.

I want to second, as enthusiastically as I can, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, with reference to his remarks as to the Union people of the South, and particularly when he said that it was very easy to have been a Union man in the North during the late trouble, but it required all that a man could do, all that he had, that it involved the honor and safety of his family in the South, even their very lives, to become a Union man and proclaim it in that section. Because, Mr. Chairman, such a man not only offered his own life for his country, but he imperiled the lives of his family and all that he had on earth as well.

What did it require in the North for a man to be a Union man? His neighbors were Union; the old flag still floated over them; the church people were altogether Union people; the societies were Union people; the wives were Union people; daughters were Union people; the young men were for the Union, and were encouraged to come to the front by their sweethearts, by their mothers and sisters, and to proclaim themselves for the Union. But how different was this condition in the South! There, sir, the young man who stood out for the Union, who proclaimed his love for the Union, who proclaimed himself willing to offer, if need be, his life for the sake of the Union and the flag of his country, was in many localities regarded as a disgraced man; his sweetheart turned her back upon him; his mother said, "You are a traitor to your section of the country"; the father said, "You can no longer find shelter beneath my roof, you must shift for yourself," and the people everywhere proclaimed him a traitor to their cause. That was the position of the young man who stood for the Union in the South, and who went into the Army from that section. Old men, men who had families, men with grown daughters, saw them discarded by young men who went with the South; saw their sons thrown out of business, discharged from positions of trust or honor, because they loved the Union.

I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that tongue can not tell nor can pen describe the heroism, the patriotism, the bravery, required for a Southern man during that period to stand out for the Union. [Applause.]

I have followed the teachings of a Union man. My father was a slave owner. My father had property in the South; but for the Union, for the love of his country, he said to his slaves, "Let the shackles be stricken from your limbs," and they went free. He said to his sons, "Shoulder your muskets; go to the front in the defense of the flag of your country"; and he said to the Federal armies when they went among us, "You are to share my barn and my cattle; knock down, dress, and eat"; and they did, and he never received a farthing, nor did he ask it, from the Federal Government. [Applause.] That is the kind of men that were Union men in the South. That is the situation they had to meet on all occasions when they proclaimed their allegiance to the old flag.

But how different was it in the North! Their barns were securely locked and removed from the scene of devastation or war. Their cattle fed on a hundred hills and roamed without molestation; their horses stood secure in the closed paddocks; the homes of the people were homes of happiness, without fear of molestation or invasion by the armies on either side. That is the difference between the two sections. But now, when we come over to the other side; when the Union man of the South files his claim for stock or property which the Government took and applied to its own uses; provisions that went from the barn or the field or the shed—not from the market—often directly into the camp kettles of the troops round the old camp fires; property of which the Government got the full benefit, because there were no middlemen in this dealing, no commission was paid out of it, what do we find? They come to us here in the Congress of the United States, to the Government they helped to sustain, and say, "I have sacrificed all I have for the cause of the country; I sent my boys to the service; I gave you my cattle, my stock, to feed the Army, and when you were surrounded on all sides, in front, on the sides, and in the rear, by the foe I, knowing the danger, gave you all the aid and all the information I could, even at the risk of my life. Now, all that I ask of you is to pay me for the property that you took—I am poor and old." Will you do it? [Applause.]

Congress says, "Certify it to the Court of Claims." You certify it to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims say, "We find this man loyal; we find he furnished this stuff; we find it was worth so much; we do not allow him any interest." And they report it to Congress. Then the gentleman who comes from the great State of New York says, "I will vote for that when I am satisfied that that man was a loyal man and furnished the stuff." I tell you, I may say to that gentleman, without any reflection upon him, that there was as pure Union blood and as much sacrifice for the love of country by such citizens as ever dared to be in New York or New Hampshire or anywhere else in this great country. [Applause.]

Will you pay them? Will a Republican Congress repudiate the obligations that this Government owes to Union men in the South, who furnished food for man and for beast, to your armies, to your boys, to your brothers?

Mr. MAHON. These claims are not in the South alone. They are all over the country.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I am speaking for the South because I love the South. I want to say right here to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] I thank him for his kindly expressions, but the South is no poor country. The people of the South are not beggars. The South is filled full of men of courage, of honor, of patriotism, and of nerve to dig from the earth their subsistence. But the Union men down there want to be treated fairly in this matter, and I want to see the South treated fairly. I have been telling the people of the South, since I was old enough to stand upon a stump, that the Republican party was a national party, that the Republican party believed in running this Government in the interest of the people, that the Republican party believed in paying her debts wherever found promptly and without discount, and I believe yet that the Republican party will do it.

I said a while ago that I loved the South. I do; but I love the whole country more. That was the lesson that was taught me by my father—to love the South, but to love the country more than the South; and because of that fact you will find men all over that country to whom this Government is indebted to-day for stuff that they furnished to feed your soldiers and their horses. I love the South; I love her rocks, her hills, her valleys, her hills. I love her people, and I say to you that, so far as the South is concerned, I shall never apologize to mortal man because I live in the South; but we do ask justice at the hands of this Government. I tell you honesty dictates it. Our sense of justice must appeal to the bosoms and to the heads of every man here that these claims ought to be paid.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having said this much, not in regard to the pending bill, because I know nothing of the facts concerning it, I am willing to stand by the findings of the court. They say the Government owes this man that debt. Will you pay it? If we must borrow the money, had we not as well borrow the money to pay these men who were loyal and who furnished their substance to feed the Union armies—had we not as well borrow the money to make this long-delayed payment as to borrow money to pay promptly, when it is due, the interest on the national debt? I say to you, if there is any difference in the standing of the two obligations, it is in favor of the debt that you owe to the Union men of the South, who furnished to the Union soldiers their means of subsistence while they were there. If there was any difference, I should rather always pay the man who rendered service because he loved the country for which he rendered the service than the man who renders service because you pay him for it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, these claimants are growing old and feeble. They are fast falling into the grave. For thirty years they have expected the Government to pay these long-delayed claims, and with a trust as immovable as are the granite hills, their love of country undiminished, with eyes now dim from age, they stand and gaze toward Washington, and ask this Congress to pay its loyal citizens their just dues as the Government requires each citizen to pay to it that which he owes.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, so far from not having any intention to speak upon this subject, I am free to confess that when the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor determined to send me here the only speech I fully planned to make was one upon this general subject, if I ever got the chance. Never before has the Fifth district of Kentucky had an opportunity to speak upon this subject to the Congress of the United States through a Republican; and now, in starting to say a few words upon it, it seems to me that the obligation to pay the debts of this Government ought not to be bounded by Northern, Southern, Eastern, or Western lines. We ought to pay them all.

The only question that we ought to inquire into is this: Does the Government fairly owe the money? And if it owes it, as an honest and honorable Government it ought to pay it, and pay it promptly. How do we know that the Government owes this money? Gentlemen quibble, and it seems to me that it is not creditable either to the heads or the hearts of members, either as lawyers or men, to quibble about whether these findings of the Court of Claims are in a technical sense judgments. They are findings of the facts by the Court of Claims, the tribunal to whose arbitrament you have left the question. That tribunal has found the facts to be so and so, and the legitimate result and consequence of that finding is that the Government owes this money, and I do not care whether there is a formal judgment against the Government or not. Just as soon as the fact is ascertained that the debt is due and honestly due, the Government ought not to quibble or hesitate about whether the debt should be paid or not.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The court has passed upon everything that Congress sent to it to pass upon.

Mr. EVANS. Congress deputed to that court authority to make findings upon certain questions of fact, and that court has done so. The legitimate result of that is that the Government of the United States is ascertained to owe this money; and it is most astonishing and profoundly mortifying to me, a debt-paying man, who believes that every debt ought to be punctually and punctiliously paid, that there should be any quibble about such a matter, whether it be a private debt or a public debt. I say it is mortifying to me that any member should stand on this floor and say that it will cost too much, or that we can not afford it. Can not afford to pay your debts! Is that honest Republican or Democratic doctrine? When you owe a debt which you admit you owe, is it honest to say you can not afford to pay it? If the debt is due and you have not the money to pay it with, borrow it, and satisfy your creditor. That is what every honorable and self-respecting man will do, and the Government of the United States with its unlimited credit should do no less.

This class of claimants came to Congress and were sent to the Court of Claims. They went there, and after large expenditures of time, money, and patience they have come here again after having done as Congress told them. Now they are laughed at, taunted with quibbles and with affected incredulity as to the thoroughness of the judicial investigation. It is impossible, as everybody knows, for Congress again to investigate these claims, so that objection now must alone come from a perverse determination not to see the merit of these claims in any event.

It is well enough for gentlemen who live in certain sections to deride these war claims, because during the war if they or the people of their localities furnished any food or raiment, if they furnished anything to the soldier, they had the quartermaster or the commissary at hand to make contracts with and to see that it was properly paid for, or in some other way they were careful to get their money; but when you come to the Southern country, where the soldier in the field was at your doors, when you needed food for the men or provender for your horses, then there was no time to make a contract. These stores were taken, and not only were they appropriated, but they were converted to the actual use of the soldier and of the Army then and there. There was no time to talk about quartermasters' vouchers and receipts; and yet you say that stores taken from loyal men under these circumstances ought not to be paid for now because you have dishonorably refused it for thirty years. After your own court has ascertained the facts you say that you can not afford to do it, forsooth. That will not do. No country for one moment can afford to repudiate obligations the honesty and the justice of which have been ascertained, as has been done with regard to these claims.

I stand here and speak from the standpoint of an old soldier in my district who has a claim duly ascertained by the Court of Claims. As a young man he started at Vera Cruz and marched with the Army to the City of Mexico. He stayed in the Army until that war closed. He enlisted in the late war and was mustered out as a lieutenant-colonel at its close. He has been knocking at the doors of the United States Treasury for a score of years for an honest claim that the Government owes him. Now he is poor and has not money enough to pay rent for a home. He has not enough to live on, after waiting so long for the Government to pay him an honest debt. We are told that you can not afford to pay these debts because the Treasury is empty. If we can afford to borrow money for any purpose, we can afford to borrow it to pay debts like these, liabilities that were created in behalf of the soldier when he was in the field.

We do not hesitate now to borrow money to pay the obligations that we owe in Wall street or in London, and they are debts that we ought to pay just as well as any other. We do not hesitate to borrow money to do that, nor ought we to hesitate to borrow it to pay obligations like these. I have sometimes thought the Government of the United States was the best debtor in the world if you had a beautiful lithographic evidence of the debt; but in many other instances when that is wanting it is the most cruel, the most heartless, and the most unjust of all debtors. Unless your claim is current or you have some such evidence of indebtedness as I have suggested you are the victim of all sorts of heartless demagoguery. In my judgment it will be discreditable to the Republican majority on this floor if it shall not pay the claims that are ascertained to be justly due by the Court of Claims. I do not care whether they are judgments in the technical sense or not. These claims are just, they are honest, they are well ascertained, and these facts point to one result alone, and that is that they shall be paid. No other course is creditable to this Congress or honorable or just on the part of the Government of the United States.

I have thought it fitting in this manner to supplement the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] and those of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] upon the general subject, although the bill actually before the House is not one in which I have any other interest than as it bears upon all bills of the same class.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard briefly on this general question. Some gentlemen who are interested in this bill desire a vote on it.

Mr. McRAE. I am willing that by unanimous consent general debate be considered as closed on the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was about to suggest that it is not my purpose to oppose this bill, as I am not familiar with the facts upon which it rests, and some gentlemen are interested in having a vote at this time. If an agreement can be reached so that the vote can be taken, I am willing that unanimous consent be given to accomplish that result.

Mr. McRAE. I am not interested in the bill further than it is the claim of a constituent of my colleague [Mr. NEILL]. I know he feels a great interest in it, and I should like to have a vote. There seems to be no objection to the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will not stand in the way of a vote on the bill, provided that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas that I want about five minutes.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed on the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want four or five minutes.

Mr. McRAE. I ask that general debate be closed and then gentlemen can be recognized for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be considered as closed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I object.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the payment of all the claims passed upon by the Court of Claims, but I confess to a desire for the exercise of the closest scrutiny in order to determine which are worthy of favorable consideration.

I was attracted somewhat by the impetuous remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], the chairman of the War Claims Committee, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McCALL], who suggested that these claims were largely from the South. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that they hail from all quarters of the country. Possibly the fact that Pennsylvania has a very large claim pending either here or in the committee may explain somewhat the exceeding liberality of my friend from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. We have a bill before this House proposing to send that large claim to the Supreme Court of the United States. If that court decides that the State of Pennsylvania has not a legal claim, we do not want your money. If it decides that it has, we want it.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is substantially the condition of affairs I supposed to exist when I heard the gentleman announce his purpose to favor the payment of substantially all these claims, amounting to perhaps $20,000,000.

Mr. MAHON. I think it is a wise investment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am interested to know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania represents the prevailing view of the majority side on this question, because this Congress has been in session since the first of December last, and unless I am mistaken—and I desire to be corrected if I am—neither the chairman of the Committee on War Claims nor the chairman of the Committee on Claims has on any Friday made a motion under the rules that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider these claims.

Mr. MAHON. I can explain that to the gentleman.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not desire an explanation; I want the fact. If I have not stated the fact correctly I ask to be corrected.

Mr. MAHON. Let me give you the explanation.

Mr. DOCKERY. No; I do not care to yield now for an explanation. I simply want to know whether I have stated the fact correctly. If I have not, I shall be glad if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will say that my statement is incorrect.

Mr. MAHON. As I said before, Mr. Chairman, when this House has been in session the great appropriation bills or some privileged question has nearly always been pending on Thursday and has gone over until Friday, so that under the rules I could not, nor could any other chairman of a committee, get the House to go to the Private Calendar when privileged questions were in the way.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman and to this committee that the motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider bills on the Private Calendar is a privileged motion on Friday, and if the Speaker of the House entertains the motion it can be voted upon every Friday. I call the attention of the country to this fact, because at the "eleventh hour" of the session the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McCALL], my able colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, speaks of the exceeding liberality of the Republican party and their desire to pay honest war claims. I repeat the statement, that since the first of December last this body has been fully equipped for the transaction of business, yet on each successive Friday these chairmen have failed to make the motion that was necessary to secure the consideration of war and other claims.

Again, I ask whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] represents the views of the majority on this question, because in every campaign in my district I have been confronted by the Republican press and Republican orators, who have proclaimed to the people that if the Democratic party succeeded to power the Treasury of the United States would be impoverished by the payment of war claims to the amount of untold millions. What is the position of the Republican party? All of the gentlemen who have spoken on that side to-day have professed their desire to pay these claims. Up to this moment not a single Republican leader that I recall has taken a contrary position—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. RAY.

Mr. DOCKERY. Except the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]. I hope that the distinguished leader on that side, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who sought recognition when I arose to address the Chair, will define the position of the Republican party on this question.

Mr. MILNES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. MILNES. I want to ask you if your party did not succeed in emptying the Treasury without paying any war claims? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman exhibits a lack of familiarity with the fiscal operations of this Government that ought not to be displayed by even so new a member of this body. If he had been familiar with the recent history of his country he would have known that it was the Fifty-first Congress, a Republican Congress, by its appropriations and its legislation, that emptied the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MILNES. Nobody seems to know that but you, I guess.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to say that the Fifty-first Congress appropriated $1,035,000,000, and left legacies for future Congresses, compelling the Fifty-second Congress to appropriate $1,027,000,000. But under the lead of the able gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] in the last Congress, and by the exercise of judicious economy, the Democratic party reduced the appropriations to $989,000,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. How many millions did you leave unpaid?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] upon what principle he permitted a Republican Congress, the Fifty-first, to pay $548,000 of these claims—claims exactly like this, with similar findings—and opposed in the Fifty-second Congress, which was Democratic, the payment of half that amount? [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I am glad the gentleman has come to the rescue of the Republican party [laughter and applause], because it seemed to need some defender in this emergency.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Whether or not I have been consistent in my votes upon all questions, I am not here to say. I believe it is pretty generally conceded that I have by vote and voice advocated what I considered to be economy under all administrations of this House, whether Republican or Democratic. But I am only one of 350 members—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why did not the gentleman oppose the payment of such claims in the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know whether I opposed them or not; but if I did not, I should have done so. [Laughter.] I may have been derelict in my duty in that Congress. But it is no excuse for me or for the gentleman now, because of errors then, to continue in wrongdoing when we can see the light so clearly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir; not at this moment.

Something was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] about the difficulty of securing recognition for these claims under all administrations of the House, and he laid the fault, if I remember aright, at the doors of the leaders of the respective administrations of the Fifty-second, Fifty-third, and Fifty-fourth Congresses. I take pride in acknowledging that under the leadership of Speaker CRISP and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] appropriations were limited in the main under existing laws during the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses to the lowest point consistent with honest and economical administrations. And I want further to say in this presence that I honor the present Speaker of this House, THOMAS B. REED, of Maine [loud applause], who in this Congress has stood like a lion in the path of those who have sought to secure the passage of bills imposing large liabilities upon the public Treasury.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will you allow me a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Do you care one farthing whether they are honest or dishonest bills?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Why, you have never manifested it in this House. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that his criticism implies a compliment which I hardly expected from that quarter. Of course this is a matter on which gentlemen may differ. I have sought to make a just discrimination at all times; but perhaps it has not been clear to the judgment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as the administration of this House is concerned in respect to the passage of private claims, it has followed substantially the lead of ex-Speaker CRISP and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. I know, Mr. Chairman, that it seems somewhat ungracious to object to the payment of these claims, and I have rarely, so far as I remember, except in the discharge of official duty, interposed an objection to their consideration. I did so during the last Congress in the discharge of official duties imposed upon me by the rules and in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I have, however, not usually gone to the extent of being "ungracious" by objecting to the consideration of claims. But I want to say here and now as a Democrat, believing that taxation is a burden upon the people, and that, being a burden, we should go into their pockets only to the extent of securing revenue for a frugal, economic administration, I shall exercise the greatest discrimination in regard to these claims, and support only those where, in my judgment, the equities clearly require payment.

I know that sometimes a different policy prevails in this House from that advocated on the "stump." No member on this side goes before the people without failing to proclaim economy in public expenditures as a fundamental tenet of Democratic faith. Why, Mr. Chairman, it could not be otherwise. No Democrat could pursue a contrary policy without deviating from an essential principle of government laid down by that greatest of all Virginians, Thomas Jefferson, in his inaugural address of March 4, 1801, when, in enumerating these essential principles, he declared for "economy in public expense." Why? "That labor may be lightly burdened." And during the long period in which the leaders of the old South controlled the Democratic party and the policy of this nation they exemplified the doctrine of economy in all the affairs of Government.

On page 46 of the second volume of Mr. Blaine's Twenty Years of Congress, Mr. Blaine says, and I quote his exact language:

During the long period of their domination they guarded the Treasury with unceasing vigilance against every form of extravagance and corruption.

That is the tribute, Mr. Chairman, paid the old leaders of the Democratic party by the greatest statesman Maine has ever given to the Republic. We continued the same policy after the war and subsequent to the tidal wave of 1874, when we first secured control of this House. Under the leadership of that splendid Pennsylvania Democrat, Samuel J. Randall, the first Democratic House after the war made a reduction of more than $30,000,000 in the annual expenditures of the Government. We went to the people and said to them, "We offer you thirty millions of reasons, every one of them worth a dollar in the market, why you should support the Democratic ticket." In that contest they indorsed the policy of economy by a decisive majority.

I admit that now and then since that time the Democratic party has not always adhered steadfastly to the lines of economy laid down by the founder of the organization; but in the main it has substantially illustrated that policy.

Now, sir, it matters not whether our banner floats in victory or goes down in defeat. Let us, if we can not agree on the money question, at least be consistent in adhering to that old cardinal doctrine of the Democratic party which demands economy in the public expenditures. The eminent Speaker said upon a notable occasion in concluding an appeal to his party friends:

Whether in victory or in defeat, the Republican party is always consistent and always maintains its fundamental principles.

Let us appropriate the sentiment of the Speaker and as Democrats uphold the essential doctrines which have been laid down by the illustrious leaders of the party, and if defeat overtakes us we will at least have faithfully maintained the doctrines of our fathers—the doctrines they taught us—and if victory comes, as I believe it will come, we shall all rejoice because we will have fought a good fight and kept the faith in respect to public expenditures. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the only question before the committee is the question of paying a certain war claim amounting in the aggregate to about $900. That fact—the pendency of that bill—has been taken advantage of by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to make a political speech, criticising the administration of the Republican party in this House and in the country, and attempting to vindicate the history and career of the Democratic party at the same time.

Mr. Chairman, there is no party in this country to-day more ready and willing to pay the honest debts of this Government than is the Republican party. And if the gentleman would have allowed an interruption in his speech I should have been glad to have asked this question: How many of these bills did you vote for during the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses? I did not have the honor to be a member of the Fifty-second Congress, but was present at all the sessions, or nearly all the sessions, of the Fifty-third Congress, and there was no man on this floor who more bitterly, either by denunciation of the claims themselves, or who sought by argument to show the incapacity of the finances of the Government to pay them, than the gentleman from Missouri, who was always and constantly intervening to prevent the payment of any one of them. Now he comes here and challenges the Republican side of the House, and asks us why we are not willing to pay them!

Let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the question of willingness or nonwillingness, the question of honesty or nonhonesty, the question of equity or nonequity, does not enter into the condition which confronts us at all. It is solely and simply a question of our ability to pay the obligations.

Nothing would delight the enemies of the Republican party better than if to-day, in this House, we should accumulate a series of appropriations so large as would allow the little "8 by 10" orator in a schoolhouse and at cross-roads meetings to say, as he did in the election of 1891, that this is a "billion-dollar" Congress. And yet that would be a cheap matter, a matter of little consequence, were it not for the fact that we are confronted now by a condition. It is not a theory or a question of what we would like to do, but it is a question of what we can do.

I stand here to repudiate, without any qualification whatever, any insinuation that the management of this House—the controlling powers in this House—have undertaken to obstruct the passage of proper appropriation bills for any purpose in the world except the one question to which I shall hereafter advert. I stand here as a Republican to take my full share of the deliberate purpose of the Republican party before this country to not expend money that we know we shall not have.

It is not worth while for anybody to undertake to create faction in the Republican party by insinuations against any members of it, against any leaders of this House, against any members of any of the committees of this House. It is not worth while to do that. I stand here to say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the members of this committee, that the Republican party upon this floor is a unit. It has no factions. It has not got any ulterior purposes against its own members. It stands here as the great organized patriotism of this country to do the best it can in the condition that has been forced upon us by the Democratic party, and we do not propose to saddle responsibilities upon members. We will take the responsibility upon the representatives of the Republican party upon this floor, and appeal to the Republican party of the country to stand by us individually and collectively. [Applause on the Republican side.]

What has caused all this? The Fifty-first Congress enacted financial legislation that placed this Government beyond a condition such as we have now. It turned over to the Democratic party a surplus in the Treasury, with a law which, if the Democrats had left it standing upon the statute books, would have abundantly supplied the whole necessities of this Government during all of these years. What did the Democratic party do? Coming into power with a threat that they would destroy the revenue-raising law of the country, with a threat that they would destroy the great principle of legislation upon which the industries of this country were thriving as they were never thriving before, the very breath of their entry into power, even before they had acquired the full fruition of the election of 1892, blasted as with a simoom all the industries of the country, paralyzed the resources of money, struck down the enterprises of the country, made bankruptcy where there had been prosperity, and then, coming into power, repealed the law by which the Treasury was supplied with money, bankrupted the Treasury, and made it impossible that the people of this country could pay their honest debts. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If there is a defalcation in this country, it is due to Democratic Administration. If there is dishonor in this country, it is the child of Democratic legislation. If there is an inability to pay the debts of the country, it is the product of Democratic statesmanship. And you stand here paralyzed by your own utter inefficiency. You stand to-day trying to partition by scales, by metes and bounds, the responsibilities of this trouble, upon the members of your own party. You stand to-day charging that this faction or that faction is responsible.

The President of the United States hurled into the face of the Democratic majority of the Fifty-third Congress the declaration that you were guilty of abandoning every principle of Democracy, that you were guilty of "party perfidy and party dishonor"; and the great redeeming feature of Grover Cleveland's Administration—that which will save him in some sort of shape in the future records and pages of history—is the fact that you destroyed a great Republican revenue-raising, industry-propagating law, and when you did it Grover Cleveland, in the face of God and man, said: "My name shall never be disgraced by approving that bill." [Applause.]

Mr. MCRAE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. And you have gone on, with the Treasury bankrupt. You have borrowed $262,000,000 upon the bonds of the Government. You are attempting to put yourselves in contrast with a Republican Administration that paid $250,000,000 of the national debt in four years, that left the Treasury solvent and plethoric. You stand here to-day confessedly borrowing $262,000,000 and trembling as each telegraphic report comes from the markets in New York lest that money you have borrowed under the pretense of upholding the redemption fund shall be again drifting, under Democratic administration, across the water into the banks of London, Germany, and France. And you stand up here and attempt to criticize the administration of the Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You have made it impossible. We can not build public buildings. We can not do what we ought to do in the improvement of rivers and harbors. We can not expend the money to pay these war debts. They ought to be paid. They are honest debts, many of them. We can not have it. We can not do justice to the soldiers of the country by the application of money to the payment of pensions. We are impeded in every direction, and why? Every reason for all this points to the advent into power of the Democratic party as the cause. At the door of that party, at the door of its failure, at the door of its utter inability to administer the finances of the Government successfully, lies every blunder, every circumstance that to-day weighs with horror upon the conscience of the American citizen. And to-day, with the control of the Treasury, you have expended, every day since the 4th of March, 1893, $150,000 or over more money than you have received into the Treasury under your Administration.

Going away back to 1893, more than three years ago, every day, week day and Sunday, Christmas and Fourth of July, you have expended $150,000, at the lowest estimate, more than you have taken in, and to-day you have not a proposition on earth to make where the money is to come from. And yet you stand up, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKERY] does, and undertake to teach the Republicans of this House financial knowledge. If we have no funds in the Treasury, I say to the Democratic party it is a sad lesson of your policy that we are warned not to repeat. So, Mr. Chairman, we are driven to economy or bankruptcy or borrowing money. What shall it be? Shall it be borrowing money? I protest. Shall it be bankruptcy? No. Then what? The only alternative is economy in administration. And I stand here to say that it is not one man, it is not three men, it is not the Committee on Rules, it is not the Committee on Ways and Means, but it is the Republican party on this floor that will see to it that no act of ours shall plunge this nation deeper into debt until the people of this country restore that great party to power that has been able to supply the Treasury. And incidental to its coming back into power will be public confidence, public prosperity, the revival of industrial prosperity, a plethoric Treasury, a restored national confidence, a Republican administration, and a protective tariff law that will supply the places that have been beaten down and destroyed by Democratic administration. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words before the vote is taken upon this bill in reference to the general principle; but it is too late to proceed this evening, so I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4515, and that the motion to report the same with a favorable recommendation had been decided in the negative; the bill H. R. 2740, and had recommended that the same do pass without an amendment, and the bill H. R. 2741, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole.

GEORGE CASE.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2741) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of the estate of George Case, late of Independence County, Ark.

The bill was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. LESTER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSIONS.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I ask that it be printed and recommitted to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made. There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 2813) granting a pension to Rita Stine;

A bill (H. R. 3281) to authorize reassessments for improvements and general taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (S. R. 131) relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 3, Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 2022) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska"—to the Committee on the Territories.

A bill (S. 1537) to provide for the private sale of public lands in Missouri—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. JOY, for two weeks, on account of important business. To Mr. JENKINS, for the day, on account of important business.

ELMIRA E. DUSTIN.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3573) granting a pension to Elmira E. Dustin.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object, and upon the distinct ground that Friday is the day for the consideration of private business here, and that these bills ought to come up in their place on the Calendar.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has made that motion.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask unanimous consent that the recess be until half past 7 o'clock.

Mr. ERDMAN. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock, at the present time.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, Mr. LACEY, will please take the chair at the evening session.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 p. m.

Mr. LACEY took the chair as Speaker pro tempore, and directed the reading of the special order, which was read by the Clerk, as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar under the special order.

Mr. ERDMAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Is it possible to provide at this time that when bills have been considered in Committee of the Whole some discussion shall be had upon them in the House? I am not disposed to call a quorum; I do not want to do it; but there are some bills that ought to be discussed in the House, and, with the demand for the previous question as soon as recognition is obtained from the Speaker, we are cut off from all discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hardly thinks that is a parliamentary question. Of course, the matter is within the control of the House when the bills are reported back from the Committee of the Whole. The House can then vote down the previous question if it desires discussion.

Mr. ERDMAN. But is it possible to provide now for discussion in the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. After the bills have been reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole, an arrangement might be made by unanimous consent as to a certain time for discussion. It has sometimes been the custom to agree that the previous question should be considered ordered upon the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole to the House, and a certain time allowed for debate on each bill before the taking of the vote. That was done in the last Congress repeatedly, in order to meet the difficulty to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. ERDMAN. I will say to the other side that while we do not want to discuss all these bills, there are some that we would like to discuss, and I should be glad to have some arrangement made for such discussion.

Mr. PICKLER. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has persistently refused, every evening when I have asked it, to allow the previous question to be ordered on these bills. We can not make any arrangement here now, but I will see the gentleman about it later.

Mr. ERDMAN. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that if we can not make an arrangement for some discussion we shall insist upon a quorum hereafter.

Mr. PICKLER. Question!

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. PICKLER was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

MRS. EMILY M. VAN DERVEER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2143) granting a pension to Mrs. Emily M. Van Derveer, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Ferdinand Van Derveer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll of the United States the name of Mrs. Emily M. Van Derveer, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Ferdinand Van Derveer, at the rate of $100 per month.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The report in this case has been read, and at the adjournment last Friday evening the pending question was on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the report was again read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2143) granting a pension to Mrs. Emily M. Van Derveer, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Ferdinand Van Derveer, having carefully considered the same, submit the following report:

It is shown by the report of the Record and Pension Office that Ferdinand Van Derveer (the deceased husband of the beneficiary of this bill) was enrolled May 21, 1846, and mustered into service June 26, 1846, as first sergeant, Company I, First Ohio Volunteers, Mexican war, to serve one year. He is reported on the muster rolls of the company present; elected first lieutenant September 2, 1846, and captain October 5, 1846. He was mustered out with the company as captain June 12, 1847.

Ferdinand Van Derveer was mustered into service September 24, 1861, as colonel of the Thirty-Fifth Ohio Infantry Volunteers, to serve three years. He is reported as present with the regiment on January 23, 1863; from that date to August 31, 1863, in command of the Third Brigade, Third Division, Fourteenth Army Corps; and thereafter on June 28, 1864, in command of the Second Brigade, Third Division, Fourteenth Army Corps. After June 28, 1864, he is reported absent in Ohio on sick leave. He was mustered out of service, as colonel of the above-named regiment, August 23, 1864.

Ferdinand Van Derveer was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers October 4, 1864, with rank from the same date, and accepted the appointment November 29, 1864. He was assigned to the Department of the Cumberland January 13, 1865; was ordered on duty in the Fourth Army Corps January 21, 1865; was assigned to the Second Brigade, Second Division, Fourth Army Corps, February 8, 1865; and continued on duty in command of said brigade until June 14, 1865, when he was ordered to Hamilton, Ohio, to await action on his resignation. His resignation was accepted and he honorably discharged the service to date June 14, 1865, in special orders from this Department dated June 16, 1865.

The report from the Bureau of Pensions shows that General Van Derveer died November 5, 1892; that he drew $6 per month for services in the Mexican war (service pension), but never received or applied for any pension during his lifetime for service in the war of the rebellion; that he married to the beneficiary December 14, 1848; that she, as his widow, is now receiving a pension of but $3 per month under the act of January 23, 1867, dating from November 6, 1863.

The sworn testimony of a reputable physician who was intimately acquainted with General Van Derveer during the last forty-five years of his life shows "that his disease and death was the direct result of his army service."

Other testimony presented to your committee shows that Mrs. Van Derveer is now about 67 years of age; that she has no income whatever except the pension she is now receiving; that she has no property whatever except an old homestead in the city of Hamilton, Ohio, which is incumbered and will soon be sold at forfeited land sale for delinquent taxes unless this relief is afforded her by Congress.

The military services of General Van Derveer, in both the Mexican war and the war of the rebellion, were exceptionally gallant, meritorious, and valuable. In Gen. George H. Thomas's report of the battle of Chickamauga (the battle in which General Van Derveer won his star) he very highly commends the courage, valor, and the distinguished services of General Van Derveer during that long and bloody battle.

History of Ohio in the War furnishes many other instances of his courage and valor during the war.

For the foregoing reasons, and in accordance with many precedents, your committee recommend the passage of this bill, with the following amendment:

Strike out "one hundred," in the seventh line thereof, and insert "seventy-five," so as to allow her $75 per month.

Mr. SORG. Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee for any great length of time, but I wish to say a few words upon this bill. General Van Derveer was born in the city that I now live in. I knew him personally from 1872 until his death. I know that during that entire period he was ailing and unfit a great part of the time to practice his profession as a lawyer. At the outbreak of the Mexican war General Van Derveer entered the service and served with credit. He was promoted from the ranks to a captaincy and was mustered out with the rank of captain. In that war he contracted a chronic diarrhea, which clung to him during the entire balance of his life.

Nevertheless, when the war of the rebellion broke out he again answered the call of his country, although afflicted with this terrible disease. He went into the service as the colonel of the Thirty-fifth Ohio, and in 1861, I think, or 1862, he was stricken down with typhoid fever. He lay ill of that disease five or six weeks prior to the battle of Mill Springs, but when he heard that the regiment of which he was colonel was to be engaged in that battle the old veteran could not bear to be absent, and, against the advice of his physician and of his good wife, he ordered his horse to be saddled and brought to the door, and he rode off and took part in the battle.

In consequence of that exertion he suffered a severe relapse and for a number of weeks his life was despaired of. He came home from the Army, and, being afflicted as he was, he had difficulty in making a living for his family. The citizens, knowing his worth and the great service he had rendered to the country, elected him from time to time to positions of honor. He was twice elected sheriff of Butler County and twice police judge. His friends on numerous occasions begged him to make application for a pension on account of the disease that he had contracted in the Army and from which he suffered continually, but he steadfastly declined, saying that as long as he could make a living for his wife and children he was not going to ask the Government for a penny. Therefore, gentlemen, if the paltry sum provided in this bill is now granted to his widow, it will never amount to anything like what he would have received had he asked for and obtained a pension twenty and odd years ago, as he might have done. That pension would have run up to a great many thousand dollars by this time, but he always declined to apply for it. On the whole, I think that of all the cases that have come before this House for consideration this is one of the most meritorious, and this bill should be passed without objection.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I want to move to amend this bill by striking out "seventy-five," and inserting "thirty" in lieu thereof. This amendment, if adopted, will put this widow on the same rating that the law would allow her.

Mr. SORG. Will the gentleman allow me? This is a very old lady; she is nearly 70 years of age—

Mr. TALBERT. I have no doubt of it—

Mr. SORG. And she is in possession of a little piece of property in the town where she lives, which is now incumbered and was offered within the last week for sale for unpaid taxes. She has but one daughter living with her, and it is evident that in her present condition she needs the attendance of some one to look after her. Thirty dollars a month would not grant her the relief to which she is entitled.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no doubt that there are many thousands of widows of private soldiers throughout the land who have no property to be sold for taxes or by the tax collector, and who would be very glad to receive $50 a month, or even half of it.

Now, sir, a word or two to my unconverted friends on the other side. I use the word "unconverted," because there has been going on a sort of a revival among them for some time past, and when we left off the consideration of this service on last Friday night for the purpose of taking it up again to-night there were three gentlemen who had given in some of their experiences, showing that they had undergone a sort of conviction or change of heart, or conversion on this question. The gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. McCall, whom I do not see in his seat to-night, gave in considerable evidence of a change of mind in regard to this subject of pensions; another gentleman—Mr. HEMENWAY of Indiana, I believe—spoke on the impulse of his heart in the same strain, and my friend Mr. BAKER from New Hampshire, always a good Christian, shouted out a time or two along the same line. I want to call their attention to the fact that I think the time has come when you should call a halt in this matter and stop this extravagant appropriation of the people's money, gathered under the pretended claim of taxation for the support of the Government, to be distributed in this discriminating pension system in favor of the widows of distinguished officers.

I have no doubt but that every word my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. SORG] has said with reference to this case is true. I know that he was a gallant and distinguished officer in two wars. These are facts which can not be disputed. But, sir, that statement of itself does not furnish sufficient reason why his widow should be paid $75 a month, while the widow of the common soldier who braved the storm of battle, and who would be only too glad to get from eight to twelve dollars a month, should get nothing.

In dealing with this subject I desire to send to the desk to have read a short letter from a gentleman who was, I suppose, a distinguished soldier himself, which will speak for itself, and, as I said in regard to other letters published in the same connection heretofore, I only send it up in good faith to show the sentiment which is spread abroad throughout the length and breadth of the land among the soldiers of this country. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 14, 1896.

DEAR SIR: I think you are entirely right when you say, "The soldier's widow is as deserving and should be provided for the same as the widow of the officer."

Now, sir, I believe the widow of the private soldier, who in many cases had to do menial work, sometimes, perhaps, washing for the officers' wives to support their families while their husbands stopped bullets, made as much sacrifice as did the officers' wives and "deserve as well of the Republic." Equity—treat all who deserve alike.

Respectfully,

A. E. REDSTONE.

Hon. W. J. TALBERT, M. C.

Mr. TALBERT. I know nothing of the fact stated in that letter except as set forth by the soldier himself.

Bearing on the same subject I send another letter which I received from a soldier, I believe from Erie, Pa., to have read in my own time, for the information of the House, to further show the sentiment abroad in this land. I have been stigmatized and criticized for opposing measures that it is said I ought not to oppose at this time, and I only do this to show the sentiment in my own favor which is based on the right principle of justice and fair and equal treatment of all the soldiers of the late war. I ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question before the second letter is read? I would like the gentleman to tell us what company and regiment the gentleman Mr. Redstone, from whom the first letter was received, served in during the war?

Mr. TALBERT. Well, the letter has been read and explains, as far as I am able to explain, his position during the war. I hope the gentleman will listen to the second letter, and if that is not satisfactory I will explain to him more fully hereafter.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman has not answered my inquiry. Perhaps he did not understand it.

Mr. TALBERT. I think I understood the question of the gentleman. I refuse to yield the floor, and ask the reading of this letter.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I object to the reading of that letter. The gentleman says he desires to have it read as a sort of a justification of his course. I object to the reading of the letter, therefore, because it has no bearing upon the pending question.

Mr. TALBERT. The letter bears directly on the nature of the bill which is under discussion, and in my time I claim the right to have it read; not to justify myself, but to show the sentiment of the private soldiers of this nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when objection is made to the reading of a paper it is a matter for the House to determine by a direct vote whether it shall be read or not.

Mr. TALBERT. The House can take such action as it pleases, of course, with reference to the matter. But I think I have the right to have it read.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Chair will permit me, I have no interest whatever in this matter, but I submit that where a letter or paper is sent up to be read, pertaining to the matter under discussion, it is in order.

I only need to recall to the Chair that on more than one occasion letters of this character have been read without any point of order being raised, on the presumption that it could not be raised. I distinctly remember in the Fifty-third Congress the reading of a very celebrated letter against which I would have been glad to raise the point of order if I had thought it good.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read Rule XXXI.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined without debate by a vote of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I perfectly understand that if any member were to send to the desk and ask to have read a paper as an original matter, the point of order would lie. The gentleman from South Carolina who is addressing the House has asked to have this letter read as a part of his remarks.

I believe that the rule in the Senate in regard to reading documents has always been much more strictly adhered to than in the House; yet I am not aware that it has ever been ruled out of order for a Senator to have a pertinent letter read as a part of his remarks. I submit to the Chair—

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is right.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not beg the gentleman from New Jersey to withdraw his objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

ERIE, PA., April 11, 1896.

DEAR SIR: I have read your speeches in the House on pensions. The speech delivered by you on last Friday night meets my views and expresses my sentiments.

I do not believe in this discrimination between the officers and the soldiers who fought the battles, giving the widow of one $100 per month, to the other the paltry sum of $8.

I enlisted in 1862, and served during the war in the Eighty-third Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and two of my brothers in the same regiment, and one in the Tenth New York Volunteer Infantry, from 1861 to 1863, and I have tried to get a pension on account of the loss of an eye at the battle of Chancellorsville.

Now, it is time to "call a halt," as you say, and try to equalize the pensions a little.

Now is the time for those who pretend to be the friends of the soldier to do the rank and file justice.

You are a better friend of the soldier than half the Republicans, and if you were a candidate for Congress from here you would get a majority of the votes of the "boys in blue."

[Laughter.]

Keep up the fire; give them a shot whenever opportunity offers. I have always voted the Republican ticket, but shall not continue doing so.

[Laughter.]

I may have more to say some future time.

Respectfully,

Hon. W. J. TALBERT, M. C.,

Washington, D. C.

CHARLES RICE.

Mr. RAY. I wish to ask the gentleman from South Carolina what lunatic asylum that man is a resident of? [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. The one the gentleman from New York came out of, I suspect, before he was sent to Congress. [Laughter.]

Now, I want to say right here, Mr. Chairman, that we have here another evidence of the want of feeling toward the soldier, for whom so much has been claimed by Republicans on this floor. I would ask the gentleman from New York whether he means to dub the common soldiers of this country as lunatics?

Mr. RAY. I want to say that I regard any soldier as a lunatic who, living in a Northern State, would say or write that the gentleman from South Carolina, if he ran for office, would obtain a majority of the votes of the old soldiers in that district.

[Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. That may be true. I have nothing to say as regards myself. But I want to say to the gentleman that if the Republican party were composed entirely of such men as he is they would make lunatics of the whole nation in little or no time.

[Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, that is irrelevant. I did not introduce this letter for the purpose of making any unsavory or unpleasant comments. I introduced it because the soldier wrote it to me. I do not know him, but I put the letter in evidence and submit that it expresses the sentiment of the private soldiers themselves. I put the witness upon the stand. You can say what you please about him. You can take him and cross-examine him if you wish. He is your witness. He has been a Republican all his life. He says that your conduct has driven him into such a mood of mind that he intends never to vote the Republican ticket any more.

I have no desire to take up further the time of the committee. My remarks are already on record in opposition to this discrimination against the private soldiers of this country. I move to amend by striking out "seventy-five" and inserting "thirty." And I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I had the honor to report this bill to the House, I ask the indulgence of the committee for a very few moments while I state a few of the reasons why I believe it ought to pass.

As early as 1863 perhaps—in the first pension legislation of Congress pertaining to the Union soldier during the war of the rebellion—a provision was embraced that there should be granted to lieutenant-colonels and all officers of higher grade a pension for total disability not exceeding $30 a month. Notwithstanding the fact that all other pension legislation has been amended or modified in some particulars—always in the line of increase of pensions to privates, to officers of inferior grade, to widows and orphans, and dependents—this particular provision has never been changed from that hour until the present. In the light of this fact the Congress of the United States from the time of the war until the present term of Congress has adopted—I think I would be safe in saying in every Congress—a policy of increasing pensions to officers and to widows of officers of higher rank.

Congress has assumed, I suppose, that inasmuch as there were but few officers of these higher grades as compared with officers of lower grade and with privates and the widows of privates, it would be better, instead of making a general law applicable to the higher grades, to pass special legislation upon the merits of each particular case. I repeat, that every Congress since the war has adopted this policy, until now it is known and recognized by those who have given it attention as the unwritten law of the land. For instance, I have collated to-day, hurriedly, a statement of what was done in this respect in the Fifty-first Congress, and I call the attention of gentlemen upon the other side to this because that was a Republican Congress. I will not take the time of the committee to read it, as I want to be very brief, but I will say that this statement, which I now hold in my hand, giving the chapter and page, shows that in the Fifty-first Congress alone there were 45 cases of that kind enacted into law, giving pensions to widows of officers above the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and to officers themselves above that rank, ranging from thirty to one hundred dollars per month.

I cite this, first, to show that this has become by custom adopted as a policy of Congress, has become the unwritten law of the land, to vote private pensions in meritorious cases by special act to widows of officers and officers of a higher grade than lieutenant-colonel rather than by general legislation. I cite it again, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of showing that there has been no uniform manner or process by which the exact amount that should be allowed to the persons claiming these pensions should be determined. The cases must stand upon their own merits; and that, Mr. Chairman, is what I understand we desire here and what I desire in this case as well as all other cases. There are many cases of widows of officers to whom I would not vote pensions beyond the amount allowed by the strict letter of the law, $30 a month. There are other cases, following precedents and following justice, in which I would allow as high as $100 a month for widows of major-generals, and admirals whose rank corresponds with that of major-general. But each case should stand on its own merits. That has been the principle adopted by all Congresses since the war, both Republican and Democratic Congresses.

To illustrate that fact, I again call attention to the acts passed by the Fifty-first Congress, and repeat that I have here a statement of cases, 45 in number, showing that that number of widows and of officers were allowed pensions running from $30 up to $100; some $50, some $60, some $75, one as high as $2,000. The list is as follows:

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that, in pursuance of this policy adopted by Congress, as applicable to the pensions allowable to officers and widows of officers of a higher grade than that of lieutenant-colonel, that Mrs. Grant was allowed $5,000 a year. Is there a man in this House, I care not who it may be—I present this inquiry especially to those who are posing here as the special champions of the widows of private soldiers—is there a man in the House who would begrudge that pension to Mrs. Grant? Is there a man here who poses as the special champion of the widows of private soldiers who has the courage to get up here and introduce a bill to repeal that law, or the law allowing $5,000 to Mrs. Logan, or the law allowing $5,000 to Mrs. Sheridan—I am not certain as to the exact amount—and perhaps to three or four other widows of distinguished generals? Dozens and dozens of laws have been enacted allowing as high as $2,000 to widows of generals, and a great number allowing as high as $1,200 to widows of generals and rear-admirals. I am talking now about consistency. Is there a man on this floor who regrets that these ladies are drawing these pensions to-day, although they are wealthy, comparatively speaking, in their own right. Is there a man who has the courage or the desire to get up here and ask to repeal those laws that we adopted in pursuance of this policy to which I have referred and which I approve?

This Congress has followed the same precedent. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have adopted the same policy. This House has adopted the same policy. I want to call the attention of the House to the bill H. R. 4606, allowing to the widow of Colonel Houk $30. Immediately following that is the case of Brigadier-General Cooper, $100 per month. Then there are the cases of Major-General Hamilton's widow, $50; Major and Brevet Brigadier-General Hough's widow, $30—in that case only a brigadier-general by brevet; Major-General Carroll's widow, $100; Brigadier-General and Brevet Major-General Doubleday's widow, $100. And only last Friday a week ago this House passed a law allowing to Catherine R. Jardine, widow of Brig. Gen. Edward Jardine, the sum of $100 per month, and he held the same rank as General Van Derveer holds.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That was passed at $50, was it not?

Mr. LAYTON. Probably the gentleman is right. But the House no doubt took into consideration the fact that this lady only married General Jardine eight years prior to his death. But all this goes to show that there was nonuniformity as to the amount of these pensions, and it is the general custom and practice to permit each case to stand upon its own merits.

Mr. PICKLER. How much did the gentleman say was allowed in the case of Mrs. Jardine?

Mr. LAYTON. I said $100 per month. The gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN] corrected me and said $50. I make the point that there was no testimony adduced, such as we have in this case, and the further fact that I believe that every true friend of the soldier and of the soldier's widow will seriously consider that that lady was only married to that officer eight years prior to his decease in 1893.

Now, then, with this preliminary statement, Mr. Chairman, permit me to call the attention of this House to the special facts connected with this case and why I believe it possesses such merit as will demand its passage as recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. PICKLER. Before you leave that, will you allow me to say that the only bill we have passed granting a pension of $100 a month at this session was that to the widow of Gen. Abner Doubleday, who was a soldier herself?

Mr. LAYTON. She was allowed, Mr. Chairman, $100 per month, I will admit. I voted for that bill. It was a just and righteous bill; but I submit there is not a difference of more than $25 per month, which I am willing to concede, as between the claim of Mrs. Doubleday and Mrs. General Van Derveer. I will concede that there is that much difference and no more.

Now, then, in the first place, General Van Derveer was a gallant soldier of two wars. That is not very often the case. There are cases in which this is the fact, but in a majority of cases it is not. That ought to be given due weight and consideration by this committee. He was a gallant soldier in the Mexican war. He enlisted as a private and was mustered out as a captain.

In the second place, he served in the war of the rebellion pretty nearly four years altogether, and for two years and two months, while holding the rank of colonel only, he commanded a brigade. That ought to be given due weight and consideration. For the unusual period of two years and two months he actually commanded a brigade all the time while he was commissioned as a colonel, and only drew the pay of a colonel during that time, while he was justly and fairly entitled to the pay of a general in the Army.

In the third place, although entitled to draw a pension, as shown by the reports and by the record, which I very carefully examined when I prepared the report—the testimony of his old physician, who knew him before, during, and after the war also, shows that he was entitled to a pension under the strict letter of the law, but he never applied for a pension. Therefore he was justly entitled to a pension for thirty-five years up to the time of his death, in 1893. Proud-spirited man as he was, as all who knew him in western Ohio will recall, he declined to accept the charity of the Government so long as he was able to take care of himself. We should consider that fact in determining the amount which this poor widow should receive.

In the fourth place, the fact that death is due to army service is another consideration that is always considered and should be considered by members of the committee. His death was due, as shown by his physician, to his army service. In all cases we have made the distinction as to whether death was due to natural causes or from service in the Army. We always make a greater allowance in case of death from army service origin than from other causes.

In the fifth place, the beneficiary, the widow of General Van Derveer, married in 1848. That is a material consideration, which addresses itself at once to the sympathy and judgment of men in deciding on these special bills. From 1848 she was his faithful wife. During the whole war of the rebellion she was what was called a favored "war widow." That is another consideration. Then she is now more than 67 years of age, and in very feeble health, as shown by the testimony before the committee. That is another material fact.

In the seventh place, she has no income whatever, except a small service pension of $3 a month allowed to her by reason of her husband's service in the Mexican war. The testimony before the committee shows clearly and conclusively that this old lady has no income whatever except that pitiful pension of $3 a month. She has no property at all, except a little old homestead in the city of Hamilton, worth a few hundred dollars, and which to-day is advertised at forfeit tax sale for the nonpayment of taxes, showing conclusively her poor and indigent circumstances; not having enough money, not having enough income, to redeem that little property she possesses and which she occupies from a forced sale for taxes; and this must have been going on for a period of two years, otherwise it would not have been thus offered for sale.

Now, with these eight reasons, I appeal to this committee if this is not an especially meritorious case. Conceding all these arguments as to the discrimination between the widows of private soldiers and the widows of officers to be true, I will ask if under all the circumstances, in view of the policy that has been adopted, in view of the eight facts I have here stated, this bill does not appeal to us as a specially meritorious case, and that this old lady should be allowed this small sum of money, which she will only enjoy probably during a very few years, owing to her feeble condition.

As a firm friend of the private soldier, as the 5,000 or 6,000 names upon my private pension roll will show, during the five or six years that I have been in Congress, in the utmost good faith I appeal to this committee to vote this poor widow this sum, and not adopt the amendment submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I come from a constituency that has not had a Republican Representative on this floor in thirty-five years, and I am going back to that constituency with the record of never having voted against a pension bill reported by this committee. [Applause.] I have not proceeded upon the theory that all the patriotism is upon the other side of the House. I have rather gone upon the theory that we should show some of it on this side [applause], and upon the further theory that the Committee on Invalid Pensions is composed of men of prudence, of integrity, of judgment, and that when, after considering a case, they say that the person whom they recommend for a pension ought to receive $75 a month, we should not undertake here, hurriedly and without full consideration, to reduce it to $30 or to any other sum. In the few words I had to say on the general appropriation bill I called attention to the fact that the women of this country had suffered a great deal from the war; that the men who went to the front had not endured all the suffering; that sometimes the women who remained at home suffered as much from the anxiety and the torments of mind and heart which they endured on account of their beloved ones at the front. Apropos to that, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an article from this morning's New York Journal, showing how, under certain circumstances, women are capable of the highest heroism. This article tells of the heroic action of a woman in the present Cuban war.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I must object to the reading of that article. It does not appear to be connected in any way with the subject under discussion.

Mr. WALSH. Very well; I will read it myself in my own time.

SHE FOUGHT LIKE A TIGRESS AT BAY—SEÑORA ALVAREZ'S GALLANT ATTEMPT TO RESCUE HER HUSBAND—TOO WEAK TO FOLLOW HIM THROUGH THE LINE, SHE WAS SURROUNDED BY SOLDIERS—SHE AND TWO CUBANS WHO HAD JOINED HER WERE CUT TO PIECES BY THE SPANIARDS—FELL SHOUTING "VIVA CUBA LIBRE!"—AND 5,000 INSURGENTS ANSWERED THE CRY WHILE THE ENEMY CROSSED THEIR SABERS IN RECOGNITION OF A WOMAN'S COURAGE.

KEY WEST, FLA., April 16 (Habana, via Key West, April 15).

Your correspondent, who is with Maceo, has forwarded me the story of a tragic incident that occurred during the battle on Saturday, in which the Spaniards were so seriously defeated by the insurgents.

"As the Spaniards were retreating," he writes, "one woman was killed while performing an act of courage that has been without parallel among the women of war, and three men lost their lives while trying to save her. She was Señora Paquita Alvarez, one of the female company that Señora Hernandez organized.

"Señora Alvarez's husband was in the battle, and during the retreat he, with two Cubans, saw a chance to capture Lieutenant-Colonel Dehos. The Spaniard had moved a little too far from the right flank of his command, and Alvarez and his companions made a dash for him. Dehos saw the movement and ran for the shelter of his troops. The Cubans rashly pursued him too far, and in a moment found themselves fighting for their lives with a score of the enemy.

"Señora Alvarez saw her husband's danger and rushed to the rescue, followed by two Cuban soldiers, who were determined that she should not be unprotected. Señora Alvarez fell on the Spaniards surrounding her husband with the ferocity of a tigress. He was fighting alone. The two other men who started to capture the colonel with Alvarez were both dead. The quarters were too close to permit the use of rifles, so Señor and Señora Alvarez and the two Cubans who followed her were fighting with machetes. It was a battle against fearful odds.

"Suddenly Alvarez thought he saw a chance of flight through the line to safety. He called to his wife to follow and started off toward the rebel column through a living wall, but Señora Alvarez was too weak to cope with so many soldiers, and the two men who formed her volunteer escort were not equal to the task of overcoming the numbers who closed in behind Alvarez.

"Señora Alvarez and her escort were cut to pieces in sight of their friends. As they fell, shouting 'Viva Cuba Libre!' the 5,000 rebel soldiers answered the cry. Even the Spaniards crossed themselves in recognition of such fanatical courage.

"Señor Alvarez did not know that his wife was not with him until he arrived inside the Cuban lines. When he learned what had happened, he put the muzzle of his pistol to his breast and fired.

"Why did you do that?" asked General Maceo when the battle was over. "So that it could not be said that I was a coward and deserted my wife to save myself," replied the soldier.

"Pray for death to come, then, for if you live I shall hang you. We need men to be shot by the Spaniards. We can not waste bullets on ourselves," said Maceo.

"Alvarez joined his wife in eternity before dawn next day."

FREDERICK L. LAWRENCE.

Now, my friends, if there is a small minority in this House—and I must say it is a very small minority, an infinitesimally small minority—who oppose pensions, for Heaven's sake let them not make war on women. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I would not detain this committee to-night one minute were it not for the fact that I knew General Van Derveer well in the Army, served with him, know what he was as a man, know what he was as a soldier, and know full well that he merited as much as any man who wore the blue and bore the rank which General Van Derveer did during the last year of the war. I first became associated with him in the valley of Chattanooga after the field of Chickamauga, when I was assigned to duty in the same division in which he commanded the brigade, and from that time forward as long as he was able to remain in the field I saw him daily in camp, on the march, and in battle. I know that no officer who commanded men was more kindly, more thoughtful, more considerate of the private soldier, of his necessities and his comforts, than was General Van Derveer.

Mr. LAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman to say just one word?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAYTON. Right in that connection I want to say what I forgot to say a while ago, that while it is true that General Van Derveer for a number of years enjoyed a comfortable income as judge of the court of common pleas, yet, by reason of his great, big heart, such as nearly all the old army officers possessed, and by reason of his well-known charity and benevolence, he was kept poor. No old soldier, especially no widow of an old soldier, ever applied to General Van Derveer and went away empty handed.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, that was simply the carrying by General Van Derveer into his private life of what I know he practiced day by day in his connection with the men who were under his command. No soldier that served under him ever suffered for anything if it was possible for General Van Derveer, from his own purse or by any means that he could control, to relieve his suffering or supply his wants. During all those long months of service, when I was with him, I was conscious, as we all were, that the man was overtaxing his strength.

In repose about the camp he looked feeble. He was never found moving about as other men were. Kindly and agreeable to all, he evidently was unable to move about with comfort, as others did. But, sir, when the sound of battle came, when the men were drawn up in line and the enemy was in sight, no man exhibited more physical power or endurance, or more courage, than did General Van Derveer. I remember, as well as though it were but yesterday, when the long lines were drawn out in the valley of Chattanooga, stretching north and south, confronting Mission Ridge, General Van Derveer's brigade in the center of that line and old Turchin's brigade on his immediate right, when the six shots were fired from Fort Wood, I myself carried the order to him to advance his line, and I sat there on my horse and saw him ride across that valley, immediately behind the front line of his men, without a single one of his staff officers about him.

By his orders they were all compelled to remain in the rear and not risk their lives in the open field, but he, thoughtless of himself, thinking of nothing but the victory that was in sight, moved on horseback over the open field, behind the very front line of his men, under a heavy fire, until they reached the foot of the ridge where horses could no longer go, and then, during some fifteen or twenty long minutes, General Van Derveer could be seen on all fours, climbing up, hand over hand, and he was one of the first to leap the breastwork above, mingling with his men on the summit of the ridge. [Applause.] When he reached there—when the enemy disappeared—when the night came, and with it victory, General Van Derveer sank exhausted to the ground; and there he lay, unable to go back along the hill to his quarters.

Mr. MILNES. Ought not those men who went ahead of General Van Derveer—those private soldiers who were in the forefront of that battle—ought not they to receive $75 a month?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Let me say to my friend that while I have not been favoring the payment of large pensions, as some of you know—while I have not been in favor of improper discriminations—yet the common sense of all the people of our land and of all nations has made discriminations between the salary paid to the private soldier and the salary paid to the officer. An officer does something more than bring to the service mere personal bravery. All the men in the ranks had that, and the Government paid but little for it. Shall we say now that the Government did not do right because it did not pay every private soldier as much as it paid General Grant or General McClellan or some of the other distinguished generals? No; the common judgment of the people of this and every other country is that those distinctions must exist necessarily.

The commanding officer brings to the service something more than mere muscle. He brings brain; he brings intelligence; he brings the power to think and lead; and these he is expected to exercise in moments of supreme danger. Looking, as he may, over the entire field, he is expected to think for the men under his command; he is expected to see that they are not put in a dangerous place for no good purpose. Their lives are at the mercy of his naked order. He must, if he occupies high position, be a man who in moments of danger is capable of thinking coolly. Van Derveer was a man of that kind.

Now, if my friend from Michigan [Mr. MILNES] says that he does not believe that any man who held a commission should receive more pension than a man who did not—

Mr. MILNES. I do say so.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Then I recommend him to introduce a bill to repeal the pension laws that have given to lieutenant-colonels and all officers above that grade $30 a month.

Mr. MILNES. I would introduce such a bill if I thought I could pass it.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Try it; introduce your bill; show your faith by your works; otherwise we shall know that you do not believe what you say.

Now, sir, I wish that this committee, instead of recommending the granting of a pension of $75 a month, had fixed it at the moderate and respectable figure of $50 a month. I say this as one who to-day respects the memory of Ferdinand Van Derveer, true soldier as he was—a man who daily was burning the candle of life at both ends that he might do his whole duty in commanding the regiment and afterwards the brigade that he was in charge of. I believe that this bill ought to pass; but I would have preferred that the committee had made the figure $50 instead of $75. I believe that my friend from South Carolina—

Mr. TALBERT. If the gentleman will offer that amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. CONNOLLY. With the understanding, then, that the gentleman from South Carolina will accept this amendment, I propose to make this pension $50 a month.

Mr. SORG. I hope the gentleman will not do that. General Van Derveer for the last few years of his life, had he been a private, would have been entitled to $72 a month.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I submit that this widow had better have a bill passed giving her a pension of $50 a month than fail to have any passed at all.

Mr. SORG. The gentleman need not be alarmed about that.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I feel that this bill ought to be passed, in view of the services of General Van Derveer, of his personal sacrifices, of his intelligence, of the care that he gave his men. I feel that there is no man who served under him as a private soldier who, if his voice could be heard here to-day, would not say, "Give this pension to the old widow of General Van Derveer, who, while he was leading us, was sitting at home watching and praying for him and us together." [Applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] is accepted as an amendment to my amendment, and the pending amendment is now to reduce this pension to $50.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is anything too good for an old soldier, whether he be general or private. But I do believe that in taking up this class of claims at our Friday night sessions, and giving almost all our time to them, we are doing wrong. It is a question here of who shall have precedence in this matter—the claims of the widows of general officers of the Army or the claims of the widows of privates and the privates themselves. I know that gentlemen on the committee have been active in their work. But, Mr. Chairman, I know also that there is a bill now that sleeps here in the pigeonholes in this Capitol that if passed would grant a pension of $30 a month to an old blind man who served during the whole war, and who is now receiving but $8 a month, a man who has eight or ten little children clustering around his knee begging him for bread, and I claim that this committee, instead of allowing pensions in the cases that we have had here for the last two evenings, should give consideration to payments of that kind. I know a number of just such cases of absolute helplessness and necessity. Within my own personal experience I have two cases of blind soldiers with families surrounding them, and who are absolutely not able to furnish the necessities of life for their support. And yet these cases must give way and we must give up half of our time, as we have done here to-night, to grant pensions of $75 a month to a noble lady. I have no doubt—I have no question to make as to that fact—I have no objection to make to any consideration that can be given to her when her necessities are considered; but it is wrong, I repeat, to take up this time to the exclusion of the claims of old soldiers all over the country who can not secure pensions by reason of technical obstructions thrown in their way at the Pension Office.

Why, gentlemen, there is not a man who sits here on this floor to-night, who will allow his memory to go back in his own district, but can remember old soldiers struggling along for the absolute necessities of life, often without even the necessities of life, who have not been able to secure their pensions because of technical constructions of the law placed upon it in the Pension Office. And these sessions of Friday evening, fixed expressly for the purpose of granting pensions, if we carry them out to their strict letter and in conformity to the intention with which they were originated, are designed to grant that class of people pensions who can not otherwise secure pensions and give them the necessary relief, and not take up the time, as we are now doing, to increase a pension of a widow from thirty to seventy-five dollars a month or more.

I repeat, I do not desire to criticize the action of the Pensions Committee. I have no doubt that they are doing the very best they can. The trouble is that where a case involving a pension of $75 a month is presented it is a large amount, and the parties who have it in charge can stay more closely by the committee, give more attention to the matter, and get it reported sooner than we can get reports on ordinary pension bills. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; I can not yield. To gentlemen who are clamoring for a vote I will state that you may as well await your time. I propose to take my time on this question, and shall continue to do so if every man in the House cries "Vote." On last Friday night you were willing to listen to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who talked the time of the committee out. Now, I hope you will hear me for a little while. The gentleman from South Dakota, during the discussion on a similar question on last Friday, said, referring to myself, that I did not know anything about the question—his language being: "No, sir; the law does not allow anything. The gentleman does not understand the question." And this is in reference to these ladies who are getting an increase of from thirty to fifty and seventy-five dollars a month. The law did give them $30 per month. He said he would not allow me to ask a question because I wanted to mislead the committee.

Now, how did I mislead the committee? I ask your attention to my language in the RECORD, and see where it is calculated to mislead the committee. I simply put this question in substance: "Why is it," I asked the gentleman, "that this case of Mrs. Helen Morrill Carroll is reported here at $50 a month, when the utmost that you grant on a favorable report on a bill to grant a pension to the widow of a private soldier is $12 a month?" Now, in that I did not desire to reflect upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions; not by any means. They were only following a precedent that had been set here and carried out up to this time. But I do desire to object to the taking up of the time of the House in the consideration of these pensions.

On last Friday night what did we consider? We considered five claims, seeking to raise the pensions of the widows of officers from thirty to seventy-five or a hundred dollars a month. We considered at the same time four or five claims for private soldiers.

Mr. Chairman, I am not alone in my objection to this system. Every man almost in this committee, if he dared to say it and speak his own thought, knows that I am right in claiming that the committee should consider the claims of those people who are in absolute need of the necessities of life; the widows who have little children clustering around their knees, to whom they can not furnish clothing or food. These people should have consideration, and not have the time of the committee taken up in considering claims of increases of pensions from thirty to seventy-five dollars a month.

Mr. LAYTON. I hope the gentleman will allow me just a moment. I know he is a fair-minded man, and does not want to mislead or misrepresent the Pension Committee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly not.

Mr. LAYTON. I am a member of that committee, and will you not permit me to make a single statement in this connection? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly I will allow the gentleman, if the members of the committee around me will yield, and not insist upon a vote just now.

Mr. LAYTON. In this connection—and I know the gentleman is a fair-minded man and does not wish to misrepresent the committee of which I have the honor to be a member—in this connection let me state to him that it so happened that just now and including the last Friday night session we have reached on the Calendar what I may call a nest of these cases of widows of officers. But it must be remembered that this committee has reported some 300 bills, an unprecedented number for the short time we have been in session, and of that number we have reported, I venture to say without knowing the exact facts, more bills allowing privates from $50 to $73 a month than pensions to widows of general officers at $50 or $75 a month.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAYTON. Certainly; with the permission of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HULL. Have you reported a single bill for a private's widow at $50 a month?

Mr. LAYTON. No; not at $50 a month. We have at $35.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Have you reported a single bill for any widow of a private at a rate above $12 a month?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. How many?

Mr. LAYTON. I do not know.

Mr. LEIGHTY. May I be permitted to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. LEIGHTY. Have you reported a bill allowing any private a larger sum than he would get under the law?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes. Of course if we had not, why he would get his pension at the Pension Office.

Mr. LEIGHTY. I mean if he were able to establish it?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes; quite a number of them; especially in the cases which the gentleman from Indiana referred to, of old blind men.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I decline to yield further. I do not intend to criticise the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I do not see why they should get that idea. They are a hard-working committee. They have done an immense amount of work in this House; but every time a man gets up here to criticise a bill or to criticise the action of this committee sitting here, he is not criticising the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I do not desire to criticise their action, but I simply desire by my statement here to-night, if I can, to call the attention of this committee to the fact that, in the place of wasting our time here and taking up half the time on the Private Calendar in this way, we ought to get down to these poor widows and grant them their $8 and $12 a month.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HEMENWAY. If I should do as the gentleman from South Dakota did to me, I would not yield, but I willingly yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. PICKLER. You had better not follow my bad example.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am not going to follow your example. I will tell you right now that I will not follow your example.

Mr. PICKLER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the second bill from where we are now on the Calendar is a bill recommending a pension of $42 a month to a private's widow.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from South Dakota to this letter which I hold in my hand, and which reads as follows:

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Indianapolis, Ind., April 14, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: General Walker, commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, directs me to write to you that he has read your remarks in the Indianapolis Journal in regard to giving large pensions to widows—

That was the question that I put to the gentleman from South Dakota at last Friday night's meeting—instead of acting on general remedial legislation for the benefit of soldiers, and to say that he heartily indorses your position and believes that Congress would be doing much better service to the old soldier if they would take up and pass the bill on invalid pensions, which comprises within its limits the legislation that is most urgently demanded by ex-soldiers.

Very respectfully, yours,

IRVIN ROBBINS, Adjutant-General.

HON. JAMES A. HEMENWAY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

And I want to say to you that not only are the commander of the Grand Army of the Republic and the adjutant-general of the Grand Army of the Republic, but the grand army of soldiers all over this country, and of soldiers' widows who are wanting for the necessities of life to-night, and who have very few comforts, are back of me and back of this letter, and want this committee to stop taking up their time Friday night after Friday night in the consideration of claims to raise pensions from $30 to $75 a month, but to come down to these poor old widows that need the $8, to these poor old blind soldiers who have their little children suffering around them, to grant to them what they deserve. And I want to say to you gentlemen—I say this in all kindness to the Committee on Invalid Pensions—

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY (continuing). It is not the fault of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, it is the fault of members who press this class of claims before the committee. Yes, I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS. Do you understand it is the fault of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that a general bill has not been brought forward for consideration here?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have just said, and I repeat it, that I am not criticising the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I do not see how I can make it any plainer than I have. They have worked hard. I pass their committee room down there and find them actively at work all the time; but it is this committee here that allows these claims to come up to take up the time in the place of passing other bills. It is not a question whether these claims are right or not, it is a question of who shall have precedence, the old soldier's widow, who is suffering for the necessities of life, or the general's widow, who is now receiving $30.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I decline to yield further. It is a question of who shall have precedence. These soldiers' widows, who are actually in want for the necessities of life, these old soldiers, who are actually in want for the necessities of life, whether they shall have precedence here or whether these bills to increase pensions from $30 to $75 a month shall have precedence. Why, in Indiana and South Dakota a widow can live very comfortably on $30 a month. Whole families in our State live comfortably on less than $30 a month.

Why should we take up our time increasing the pensions of those who are well cared for, in place of getting down to and helping out those poor and suffering widows and soldiers who need to be cared for. Grant these large pensions when the time comes to grant them; but for God's sake give to those who are suffering the preference in the consideration of their cases. [A cry of "Vote!" "Vote!"] That gentleman, I presume, claims to be a grand friend of the soldier. Let me say to the gentleman who made that remark that I represent 6,000 soldiers. I care for their interest. I answer an average of from 65 to 70 letters a day to those old soldiers. I give their interests full consideration and protect them in every way I can. I go to the Pension Office and go through the files wherever a wrong has been done, and have it corrected when I can. I see sitting about me gentlemen whom I meet at the Pension Office. They are out helping the people who are needy; and those gentlemen who want to vote, I do not know them; but possibly the gentleman is a general himself. I say that these cases ought to be laid aside and the cases of widows who are in want, and soldiers who are in want, but by reason of some technicality can not secure pension under the law—their cases should be taken up here and passed upon.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I have taken very little of the time of the committee at this session, and do not propose to make any extended remarks to-night. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAYTON], in his illustration, certainly misrepresented, unintentionally, no doubt, some of the pensions that have been granted in the past. He referred especially to Mrs. Grant receiving $5,000 a year, which is true, but she gets that pension as the widow of an ex-President of the United States. The same amount is given to every other widow of an ex-President of the United States. He referred to Mrs. Logan's pension as $5,000, when as a matter of fact it is but $2,000.

Mr. LAYTON. I stated that I was not certain.

Mr. HULL. That, however, is the fact.

Mr. STEELE. The widow of General Sheridan gets the same.

Mr. HULL. The widow of General Sheridan is also receiving a pension of $2,000 a year. He was General of the Army. However, that has but little to do with this.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I believe there is a distinction in rank. I do not believe that the comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic say that the officer's widow shall receive no more than the private; but I do say that every comrade of the Grand Army believes this to be true—that the officer's widow, under the law getting $30 a month, is not entitled in equity to an act of Congress to increase her pension beyond that, because when the soldier's widow comes here she gets but $13 a month, the amount allowed by law. That is the point. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] made a splendid speech in favor of a large pension to the gentleman whose widow is now before this House. If the gentleman himself were here applying for an increase of pension, I think this committee would be doing right to grant the request and increase it, but gentlemen are aware of the fact that we do not take into consideration and can not consider the disabilities of widows in granting a pension. This widow is entitled to $30 a month under the law, which is two and a half times the amount of pension allowed to the widow of a private soldier whose death resulted from his service; it may be that this gentleman's death resulted from his service; but it must be conceded that he lived a long time since the war, as he died in 1895.

Mr. LAYTON. But he drew no pension.

Mr. HULL. That makes no difference.

Mr. LAYTON. But it can be taken into consideration.

Mr. HULL. If he was entitled to receive a pension, all he would have had to do would have been to put in an application and receive it. And I am willing to accept the gentleman's statement that he was entitled to a pension; but the House has no business with that question now. But under the law—

Mr. SORG. Should not the House take that into consideration?

Mr. HULL. Well, we will take it into consideration, and the widow of this officer is entitled to $30 a month.

Mr. SPALDING. Admitting that he died as a result of the service.

Mr. HULL. Admitting that the cause of death was the result of his service, and then there is no man in the United States who served in the Army who would raise his voice against giving this widow a pension of $30 a month. If she can not get it at the office, she can get it at the hands of the United States Congress; and nobody criticises the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I do not criticise it. God knows they have a hard enough task in dealing with members who desire to have special bills reported. There is no doubt about that. But I have noticed where a widow was compelled to come to Congress and applied for $30 or $35 a month, in almost every case the committee reported an amendment striking out the $30 or $25 and inserting $12, giving her the pension that she would be entitled to under the law if she could prove that the husband's death was the result of his service.

Now, here comes a widow who can get $30 a month if she can prove that her husband's death resulted from his service, and no man in Congress would object to giving her $30 a month. But I want to object now, as I did once before this session, to taking up these bills for officers' widows and granting them large pensions while thousands and thousands of widows of the boys who carried the musket are fighting in vain for $8 and $12 a month. [Applause.] My good friend from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] drew a splendid picture of a battle where this brave general commanded his brigade, but in his very statement he admitted that the private soldiers, with their muskets in their hands and their 40 rounds belted around them, crawled upon their hands and knees ahead of the general, and if one of their widows were knocking at your doors to-night for relief, saying that her husband had sacrificed his life in defense of his country, and if she was unable to prove that his death was the result of his service, you would grant that poor old widow of a private soldier but $12 a month.

Mr. HEMENWAY. But we would do it in about two minutes instead of taking two hours.

Mr. HULL. Well, you would do it. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are unfortunate in another thing in this Congress, and we of the majority must be held responsible for it. It is true that our friends in the minority, who have objected so strenuously to small pensions for the widows of private soldiers, have kept their mouths sealed when it was a question of granting a large pension to the widow of an officer, until at last our friend from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] has thrown himself into the breach.

Those gentlemen who have fought us so hard on the small pensions have had no objection to our raising the pension of a widow of an officer to $75 a month or higher; but we are responsible all the same for the action of this House, and the word has gone out over the United States that the Republican House of Representatives can take night after night to consider bills granting from $50 to $100 a month to the widows of officers, and yet can find but scant time to provide pensions for the old soldiers and their widows. I said to this committee when we started out in this session that I should oppose these large increases of pensions to the widows of officers above the amounts allowed by law. I have been awfully lonesome from that time until now. But last Friday night, when we were considering certain bills giving large pensions to the widows of officers, a few other gentlemen were found joining in my protest, and I am glad now to welcome the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] as a champion of the private soldiers of this country, by whose devotion and heroism the flag of our country has been maintained unsullied and the Union of the States has been cemented so that even the hand of treason can never again be raised against it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. HULL. Certainly; two of them, if you wish.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman said, with much vehemence of manner, that the time of this House has been taken up and that it has gone out all over the country that the time of this Republican House has been taken up with the consideration of bills granting pensions to generals and their widows.

Mr. HULL. I did not say to generals.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, pensions to the widows of generals.

Mr. HULL. Yes; I said that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And that it had gone out that this House could find but scant time to consider bills for pensions for the widows of the boys who carried the musket. Now, has there been any pension claim of a widow of a private soldier skipped?

Mr. HULL. No; but how much did they get?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There has, then, been no claim of a private soldier, or of the widow of a private soldier, skipped or neglected. That being true, and the cases being taken up in their order on the Calendar, what justification is there for this tirade about this Republican House having scant time to take up and consider bills for pensioning private soldiers and their widows, when, in fact, we have taken them up in their order and have skipped none. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HULL. I will answer that question. At last Friday night's session the time was taken up almost entirely in the consideration of bills granting high pensions, and if the gentleman has read the dispatches in the leading Republican papers of the great Northwest he knows that what I said is true, and that the papers have been discussing the matter as I have stated to-night. I do not say that we have not considered every claim on the Calendar in the order that it has been presented to us. I do say that many of these claims for small pensions to the widows of privates have been fought, not on this side of the House, but on the other; but that does not absolve us from our responsibility in connection with the fact that in the aggregate of pensions passed by this House the number of officers' widows is out of all proportion to what it should be. There is one brigadier-general to a brigade; there is one officer's widow to thousands of the widows of privates. Yet on last Friday night how many bills did we consider for the widows of privates and how many for the widows of officers?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to occupy a moment of the time of this committee; but I feel that I am justified in referring to two or three matters suggested by this discussion. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] and other gentlemen here that if they desire to know the reason why the claims of these generals' widows are presented here by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, they can ascertain the reason by applying to the members who introduce and press these bills. The Committee on Invalid Pensions is divided into subcommittees, each man having a certain territory, embracing sometimes more than two States; and each subcommittee permits the gentleman whose bills come to him to select the bill that shall be presented by the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. That is it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is the reason these bills are here. It is not the fault of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It is because of the fact that the men who introduce these bills are hounding the committee to bring them in and are standing around and insisting upon having them pressed, to the exclusion of the bills for the privates and their widows. That is the fact of the case, if you want to know it.

Mr. PICKLER. That is it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Let me go further and say that if the men who stand in their places on Friday nights and condemn the committee would go to work and ascertain what evidence should be presented in connection with their cases, would get it in proper shape and present it to their subcommittee, their bills would not lie covered with dust in the committee room. Sometimes a member of Congress brings in twenty-five or thirty or forty or fifty bills, and half the time he does not get the number of the regiment correctly; then the bills are turned over to the subcommittee without any of the necessary evidence, without a single fact to support them; and the Committee on Invalid Pensions is expected to root around and find the testimony, put it in shape, and report the bills to the House. I am getting a little tired of that sort of thing. [Applause.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Is it not true that you are overworked; that you have more cases before you, with the evidence all prepared, than you possibly can get through this session?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is possibly true. These matters must be divided among subcommittees, as I have stated.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no desire to criticize the Committee on Invalid Pensions; I know that they are overworked. But, by the statement which the gentleman has just made in response to my question, it is demonstrated that he has now before him, with the evidence made out, more cases than he can possibly report and get back before the House this session.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I might say that the statement is correct. I have, I believe, 260 or 270 bills referred to me. Some are accompanied with affidavits; in other cases there is nothing but the naked bill. I suppose that in many of these cases proof could be obtained at the Pension Office. But very few bills are presented with the evidence all in shape, so that a man can take them up and consider them.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman remember that at any of our meetings, three times a week, from 10 till 12 o'clock, the gentleman from Indiana has ever appeared before our committee to ask for a pension for anybody? [Applause.]

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. KIRKPATRICK] allow me to answer that?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Have I not asked the gentleman repeatedly to report on one of my cases?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I suppose you have.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, I want to say to the gentleman from South Dakota—I do not know how his time is taken up; but for myself, being a member of the Appropriations Committee of this House, and with 6,000 soldiers writing me from time to time—I think I might almost make affidavit that I receive 75 letters a day—and with constant attendance at the Pension Office morning after morning, I have had no time to go down to the committee room and ask the gentleman to report any bills for me. I know that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] is not the proper person for me to speak with; the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. KIRKPATRICK] is the man to answer my inquiries; and he says that I have repeatedly asked him to report my cases. No doubt the gentleman is doing the best he can; he is working, I am sure, as hard as any member of the committee. I have no reason to believe that if I were to ask the gentleman from South Dakota I would get a respectful answer, because, according to the indications, he always goes off and gets mad. I do not want to insult the gentleman.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HEMENWAY. His whole demeanor here—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is out of order.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy the floor myself a little while.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I recognize that the Chair desires to protect the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I wish to finish my remarks, and then the gentleman may occupy the floor as long as he chooses.

With reference to all of these bills reported by me, Mr. Chairman, I want to state that with but one single exception the bills reported have been for the benefit of private soldiers, and at a higher rate of pension as a rule, where the requisite disability was shown, than those granted to officers' widows. [Applause.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. I desire to say that I believe the gentleman from Kansas is a good member of the committee.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I have reported bills for three soldiers at $72 a month—

Mr. PICKLER. And private soldiers, too; let that be remembered.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK (continuing). And I have made it a point to give special consideration to such bills and present them to the House and the committee for its action in preference to less deserving measures.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to say, as a member from Indiana, that we are well satisfied with the way you represent the interests of the pensioners from that State.

Mr. STEELE. Of course you speak for yourself, not for me.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Only for myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have addressed this committee on one occasion for a few moments only, and yet

I have been here at every Friday night during this session of Congress. I addressed the committee then only in order that I might explain to this committee the facts upon which I wanted them to grant a pension in the case of a soldier named in a bill which I had the honor to introduce.

I do not think it is wise for us to stand here to criticize the Committee on Invalid Pensions, for I may state that the trouble complained of does not lie in the committee at all. I am proud of the fact that I am a representative of the private soldier, for I was one myself, and I assume the right to speak for them and to champion the cause of the boys who marched in the ranks as fully as any man on the floor of this House.

But the trouble does not lie in the committee. It lies in the fact that many of the men here—and, I regret to say, on this side of the House, too—have got the mouth disease, and they have got to make it manifest on this floor every Friday night. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WOOD. Will the Chair state the question?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment offered by the committee, and an amendment to the amendment, to strike out the sum proposed and insert "thirty."

Mr. TALBERT. I offered the amendment, Mr. Chairman, to insert "thirty" instead of "seventy-five," but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] proposed to make it "fifty" instead of "thirty," and I accepted that amendment.

Mr. MILNES. I offer as a substitute for the whole proposition that the rate of pension be fixed at $30.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, will first be taken upon the substitute to strike out "seventy-five," as reported by the committee, and insert "thirty."

Mr. MILNES. That is just what she would be entitled to if the soldier had been killed in battle.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken very much of the time of the committee and shall not occupy its attention now more than two or three minutes. But there are some points to which I wish to ask your attention before the vote is taken on the pending question.

Something has been said about the work before the Pension Committee, and I desire to say in this connection that its work is chiefly done in the committee room, and is confined to the committee room and not to the floor of the House. Few members of the committee have done their work upon this floor, with the exception of our honored chairman and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who have perhaps had a little more than their share here. It is quite rare that any other member of the Pension Committee has obtained recognition on Friday night or at any other time for discussion of pension bills.

But I wish to say a word or two in regard to the pending amendment. I speak for myself and not on behalf of the committee. This case of General Van Derveer is perhaps as good as any upon which to say what I wish. He was a gallant soldier, and the report shows that he won his stars at the battle of Chickamauga. But, Mr. Chairman, he won his stars at that battle for the very reason that he commanded a gallant body of men, and his stars came because of the firmness and bravery of the private soldiers in the brigade which he commanded. If they had left the field as some others did, not only in this but in other battles, he would not have become a brigadier-general.

Now, a single word with reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. He gave a beautiful and a very graphic picture of the battle of Missionary Ridge. But, if I remember history aright, it was the private soldiers who stormed that ridge and carried our flag to the summit without orders of brigadier or major general—yes, despite the orders of the silent commander of that army. I ask, Mr. Chairman, if to-day the widows of the brave private soldiers who fell in Van Derveer's brigade at Chickamauga were here, asking for $50 or $30 or $25 a month, whether we should favorably consider their cases? If they got $12, it would, I fear, be about the best that we would do.

I am aware that there was a distinction in rank. The law recognized that fact. It also recognized that there was a distinction in pay. The private soldier got a great deal less pay. The brigadier-general did not trudge along in the dust of summer or the mud and snow of winter. He was provided with horses and forage and rations, and a servant to take care of them. When it came to the matter of pension, he was provided with a pension about four times the amount of the pension of a private soldier at that time. The distinction was made in the rank they bore during the service, and also in the pay that they received; and now, Mr. Chairman, there is no settled policy in regard to such cases as this. If there was, what should we give? What amount should be fixed? Should it be $30, $50, $75, or $100?

There is said to be a precedent for each, but I have yet to learn that a private enactment is ever a precedent for anything except itself, or that it settles any policy at all so far as legislation is concerned. It is a precedent for that case and for no others. I agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOLL] who has spoken upon this matter. When it comes to seeking the bounty of the Government—and that is all that these cases are—we should first have meritorious service, and then we should have the need of the applicant. I am aware that both these things concur in this case, but I do believe when it comes to this matter of bounty that the private soldier should come somewhere near the officer who was made an officer on account of the valor and heroism of the privates. You may say that we could not have gotten along with an army of private soldiers alone. We could not very well have gotten along with an army of brigadier-generals alone. We should have done a great deal better with the privates alone than with the officers alone.

Little Round Top was not lost when Zook and Weed and Vincent fell. The battlefield of Chickamauga was not abandoned when the commander and two of the corps commanders were swept from the field; but private soldiers turned their faces to the foe and their backs to that rocky spur of Chickamauga and fought out that long and weary day, and the next morning the Army of the Cumberland was found across that Lafayette and Chattanooga road, as it was at the beginning of the battle. Disaster did not come when the line of brigadiers or major-generals was broken; but when the line of blue that carried the musket and manned the cannon was broken and disappeared, then the day was lost. But in this matter, which is purely one of charity, I believe that the policy ought not to be to grant so large pensions to the widows of officers. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, to strike out "$75" and insert "$50."

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute, to strike out "$50" and insert "$30."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLES) there were—ayes 19, noes 82.

Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the original amendment as amended, namely, to strike out "$75" and insert "$50."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ANNIE THOMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4398) granting an increase of pension to Annie Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Annie Thompson, widow of Jay Thompson, late captain of Company M, Third Wisconsin Cavalry, and pay her a pension of $30 a month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment striking out the word "thirty," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

The report (by Mr. PICKLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4398) granting a pension to Annie Thompson, have carefully considered the same, and respectfully submit the following report:

Jay Thompson enlisted in Company M, Third Wisconsin Cavalry, as first sergeant November 23, 1861; mustered as first lieutenant October 2, 1862; mustered as captain July 10, 1863; discharged August 29, 1864, because of incipient consumption and hemorrhage of the lungs since entering the service by exposure and fatigues of the field while in the line of duty.

Soldier filed application for pension November 15, 1885, which was allowed October 28, 1886, at $30, for lung disease contracted in the service. He died of the same disease July 11, 1888.

His widow, the beneficiary named in this bill, filed application September 4, 1888, and on July 15, 1889, the same was allowed at $12. June 2, 1890, she applied for reissue, alleging that the disease from which the soldier died was contracted while he was captain. The soldier himself, in his own declaration, alleges that it was contracted after he became captain, and the question was never raised until after her application for reissue was filed.

Brigadier-General Blair, who commanded the regiment at that time, says: "I never noticed anything wrong with his health until after he became captain. * * * He was a faithful, efficient, and competent officer. * * * He was not only a model soldier, but a straightforward and conscientious man."

While the soldier was a small man physically, his soundness at enlistment has never been questioned, and the general trend of all the testimony is to the effect that the disease was contracted as stated.

Probably the true inwardness of the situation is best manifested by a glance at the reports of the special examiners. On February 3, 1893, after giving his views as to the standing of the witnesses, one of them says:

"The case is one of merit in my opinion, but, in order to settle the point in issue, would recommend further examination, as follows: * * * Testimony of Surg. B. O. Reynolds and Gen. Charles W. Blair: It seems to me that the evidence of these would settle the case."

On August 24, 1893, the special examiner who took the testimony of General Blair comments thereon thus:

"General Blair is a gentleman of unquestioned standing and reputation. His testimony is to the effect that the soldier was apparently sound when he first became acquainted with him in April, 1863, and remained so for some months, when deponent first became aware that soldier had lung trouble. The question at issue in this case seems to be a very difficult one to settle by the testimony of officers and comrades."

On December 26, 1893, the special examiner who took the testimony of Dr. Reynolds, above mentioned, opens by saying that "he enjoys a good reputation, but, posing as the soldier's friend, is known to be rather liberal, if not accommodating, in furnishing affidavits." And, having thus insidiously prepared the mind of the reader, disposes of his evidence by saying:

"There is no doubt in my mind that affiant was prompted by claimant, who, by the way, is described as a 'business woman.'"

The claim for reissue was rejected June 11, 1895.

A liberal view of the evidence would have resulted in the allowance of this claim by the Bureau of Pensions, and, if there is any doubt at all in the matter, your committee believe it should be resolved in favor of the claimant.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "thirty," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty," and that as amended the same do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the gentleman in charge of this measure inform the House whether this was the case of a war widow, and whether she is a dependent woman or not. It is a proposition to exercise the charity of the House instead of the justice, and therefore those would probably be two relevant questions.

Now, this man, on January 4, 1896, in an unsworn statement, says that he contracted a cold on his lungs in the spring of 1862, at Benton Barracks, Mo., and was a sergeant at the time.

Two days later, on January 6, 1886, the soldier bethinks himself, and he swears that he contracted cold during the summer and fall of 1863, at Fort Scott, Kans. Then he was a captain. Now, the question as to when he contracted this cold is a very material question. Philip in one condition says he contracted it at Benton Barracks, and Philip in another condition says he contracted it later at Fort Scott.

Now, then, this pension examiner, who is accused of being a gentleman "who would insidiously make a report against the interest of a soldier," says that he took the testimony of three comrades of the soldier, one of whom states that the soldier was delicate and drank, and had consumption before he went into the Army, did not take care of himself in the service, and was up and down with illness the most of the time. The soldier, he thinks, was sick at Benton Barracks. He does not recall the nature of the sickness. The other comrade states that he was with the soldier from start to finish of service, and that the soldier had cold and cough at Benton Barracks, and was dangerously ill. He was again taken sick at Benton Barracks, when he thought his lungs were affected and he had consumption. This continued to the end of his army service. The third comrade states that the soldier was delicate before the war, had lung trouble, was sick at Benton Barracks with lung disease during his service. He never knew the soldier to drink at all. The soldier had pneumonia after the war, in 1886. The widow is now receiving a pension of $12 per month, what she would get if her husband contracted this disease as a sergeant; and the evidence points to that. To increase her pension up to that of the widow of a captain is a pure charity. Therefore I say it is relevant to know whether this woman is dependent upon this charity, or whether, being a business woman, as the examiner says, she has means of her own, and also whether she was or was not a war widow.

But I suppose, following the lead of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH], who says that he has voted for every pension bill, we will have to pass this bill, regardless of what the evidence shows. I congratulate the gentleman from New York upon having voted for the Molly Crandall bill, for having voted for the photographer's bill, and for the teamster's bill, and for a whole raft of bills of that character. I think he ought to take that record home and paste it up for his constituents to study, and then see what they think of it.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. They will indorse it.

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes; some of them will.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. New York soldiers indorse it all.

Mr. ERDMAN. Oh, New York soldiers were a brave set of men. They want what is right. They want the "bum" relegated to the rear as he relegated himself to the rear when the fight was on, and it will not be a subject of pride when the gentleman from New York gets with his constituents and tells them that he voted for everything. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

CASSIE A. DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5814) granting a pension to Cassie A. Davis, widow of James P. Davis, and mother of Mary T. Davis, an invalid daughter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Cassie A. Davis, widow of James P. Davis, late Company E, Third Regiment of Vermont Volunteers, at the rate of $30 per month, in addition to the $12 which she is now receiving as a widow; said $30 per month to be in lieu of the $2 per month now paid on account of soldier's helpless daughter, Mary T. Davis, and to be paid so long as said Mary T. Davis remains helpless and is cared for by said Cassie A. Davis.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8514) granting an increase of pension to Cassie A. Davis on account of Mary T. Davis, dependent daughter of James F. Davis, have carefully examined the evidence and report as follows:

The soldier died from causes arising in the service, and the widow is pensioned at $12 under the general law, and $2 additional on account of the daughter, Mary T. Davis.

The evidence shows that said daughter is as helpless as an infant, and much more troublesome. She can not speak, can not feed or dress herself, can not masticate her food, and can not make known her wants to anyone but her mother, who is required to be in constant attendance on her, and so is unable to do anything for her own support.

It is absolutely necessary that the pension be sufficient to provide for the needs of both, and your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

CYNTHIA A. LAPHAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9001) granting a pension to Cynthia A. Lapham, widow of William B. Lapham.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll of the United States the name of Cynthia A. Lapham, the widow of William B. Lapham, formerly first lieutenant Twenty-third Maine Volunteer Infantry, first lieutenant Seventh Maine Volunteer Light Battery, and captain and assistant quartermaster United States Volunteers, at the rate of $17 per month, commencing at the date of the soldier's death, and to continue during widowhood, deducting any payments which may have been made to her as such widow.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9001) granting a pension to Cynthia A. Lapham, having carefully considered the facts in evidence, report as follows:

William B. Lapham, who was the husband of the beneficiary of this bill, served as first lieutenant of the Seventh Maine Battery from December 30, 1862, to May 26, 1865, and as captain and assistant quartermaster from May 10, 1865, to October 30, 1865.

While with the Seventh Maine Battery he contracted malarial fever and chronic diarrhea, for which he was pensioned up to the date of his death, his rate from November 10, 1865, being $17 per month, which was total of rank as first lieutenant. He died at the Soldiers' Home at Togus, Me., February 21, 1894, and the certificate of the surgeon of the Home shows that he was admitted to the hospital on date of admission to the Home on account of diabetes mellitus, complicated with peripheral neuritis, with a history of having suffered from malarial and chronic diarrhea and their sequelae since the war, which may have been factors in the causation of the disease for which he was admitted. His condition was not the result of vicious habits. He died February 21, 1894, of diabetes mellitus.

A certificate filed in the Pension Office July 8, 1895, by the same surgeon, concludes as follows:

"From this review of the case I feel justified in stating that while my certificate of death, dated March 6, 1894, is correct so far as it goes, it probably does not fully represent all of the causes operating to produce death, and that said certificate would be more complete if it included chronic malarial poisoning and chronic diarrhea with diabetes mellitus as a final complication, as the causes operating to produce death."

Dr. W. Scott Hill, of Augusta, Me., testifies that he treated Dr. Lapham for about eight weeks just prior to his entrance to the Soldiers' Home for chronic malarial and valvular disease of heart. That he examined the Doctor's urine for sugar and found only a trace, but he did not require or receive any treatment for diabetes. He did, however, suffer from dyspnea and edema of the lower extremities.

Dr. Lapham was for some time a member of the United States board of examining surgeons at Augusta, Me. In view of all these facts the committee are of opinion that soldier's death was due to causes arising in the service.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "month," in line 10.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE T. STEVENS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8610) for the relief of George T. Stevens, assistant surgeon, Seventy-seventh New York Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to revoke the order of November 11, 1862, dismissing George T. Stevens, assistant surgeon Seventy-seventh New York Volunteers.

Mr. LACEY. Has this committee jurisdiction?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is a long report, and I think the gentleman who made it might be allowed to state its substance, as he is familiar with all the facts; if not, I know all the details.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, the beneficiary of this bill, Dr. Stevens, was given leave of absence from his command and went home on sick leave. While there he applied for renewal of his leave of absence, and subsequently he temporarily lost his mind. During that time the application for a renewal of the leave of absence was denied, and when he returned to his command he found that he had been recorded as absent without leave and as a deserter, and, under a general order issued about that time, he was dismissed from the Army. The officers of his regiment felt that an injustice had been done him, and recommended him to the colonel for promotion, and he was subsequently restored as surgeon of the same regiment, and served during the war with a very gallant record.

This bill simply seeks to correct his military record by removing the charge of desertion now standing against him. I may say that it is not for the purpose of obtaining a pension, as Dr. Stevens is one of the most prominent oculists in the United States, with a very large practice. The object is simply to make his record in this particular perfect, as it is in all other respects.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER FLEMING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1600) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Peter Fleming.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls of the Adjutant-General's Office, in the War Department, against Peter Fleming, Battery E, Third United States Artillery, be, and the same is hereby, removed.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that bill be passed over for to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order against the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, sir; I do not think this bill properly comes up for consideration under the special order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEELE. This is a bill to remove the charge of desertion. This man, after having performed three years' service, was re-enlisted—

Mr. TALBERT. I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana that I have made a point of order against the consideration of this bill at this Friday evening session, and the Chair has sustained it.

Mr. STEELE. I hope the Chair will hear me on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STEELE. This is a bill to remove the charge of desertion, but the committee have recommended a substitute simply providing that the man may be admitted to a Soldiers' Home. He has lost both feet and is utterly helpless, and they believe that it is not improper under the circumstances, in view of his service and his present condition, that he should be admitted to a Home and have the care which he can find there, without any pension or other allowance. Both feet, and I think one of his hands, have been frozen off. The bill as proposed to be amended simply authorizes him to be admitted to a Soldiers' Home, without granting him any other relief. As I said before, the bill as originally introduced is a bill to remove the charge of desertion, but the committee recommend this substitute.

Mr. TALBERT. If that be the case I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman, although I do not believe that this bill in its present form comes properly before the committee at this Friday evening session.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been withdrawn, the question is on the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That Peter Fleming, late a private in Battery E, Third United States Artillery, by reason of faithful services as a soldier for a period of nearly three years and his present mutilated and disabled condition, be, and he hereby is, declared to be entitled to admission to the Soldiers' Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and to any Branch thereof, notwithstanding the charge of desertion against him, and he shall be so admitted at his request."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RUFUS BETZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2048) for the relief of Rufus Betz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the charge of desertion standing against the name of Rufus Betz, late a private of Company A, Nineteenth Regiment of Ohio Infantry Volunteers, be removed, and he be granted an honorable discharge, to date August 9, 1862.

The committee recommended an amendment adding after the words "sixty-two" the words:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to allow the said Betz any pay, bounty, or other allowances to which he would not have been entitled but for the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear some explanation of this bill, and of how this man came to be charged with desertion.

Mr. TAYLER. Mr. Chairman, I know that I can satisfy the gentleman from South Carolina, as well as all the other members of the committee, as to the propriety of this bill. This is simply a case where, on account of the lack of completeness in the records kept by the officers of the regiment to which he belonged, a failure occurred to have his record correct. The fact is that immediately after the battle of Stone River this man, after a long march, was sent to the hospital with frozen feet, and then was sent to the hospital at Cincinnati, and furloughed. When he reached home his condition was pitiable. His feet and body were greatly swollen. He was unable to take care of himself, and, to a certain extent, he has continued in that condition ever since. He undoubtedly had a furlough, because he did receive an extension of furlough later on. He was unable to return to the Army, but he enlisted in the Forty-fifth Ohio Home Guards and was honorably discharged from that organization about a year afterwards, his discharge being on account of his inability to perform the duties required of him. The officers refused to permit him to remain on account of his physical disability.

Mr. TALBERT. Then the object of this bill is simply to correct his military record?

Mr. TAYLER. Simply to correct his military record; that is all.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARTHA McNEIL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2944) granting a pension to Martha McNeil.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Martha McNeil, widow of John McNeil, late brigadier-general and brevet major-general United States Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $100 per month.

The report (by Mr. CROWTHER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2944) granting a pension to Martha McNeil, submit the following report:

John McNeil, who was the husband of the beneficiary of this bill, was mustered into the United States service as colonel of the Third United States Reserve Corps, Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered out August 17, 1861. He was mustered in as colonel Second Missouri State Militia Volunteer Cavalry, April 20, 1862, and was promoted to brigadier-general May 13, 1863, and from that time on he was actively engaged in suppressing guerrilla bands and encouraging the loyal citizens, and by his untiring efforts succeeded in preserving the State of Missouri to the Union. His resignation, which was tendered April 8, 1865, was accepted to date April 12, 1865. In it he said:

"I beg to state that my reason for resigning is that, having been for nearly four years in constant service, I have suffered to such an extent in my pecuniary affairs that my longer continuance in the service threatens me with financial ruin and my family with beggary."

He was a pensioner for gunshot wound of right hip until his death, which occurred on June 8, 1891.

The widow, who was married to the soldier on September 23, 1834, is now 79 years of age, is disabled on account of age and its attendant infirmities, and, as is shown by the evidence before this committee, has an income of only $284.70 per annum, which in her aged and disabled condition is totally inadequate to her needs.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Appended is a memorial of the commandery of the Loyal Legion for the State of Missouri, which fittingly describes the valuable services to his country of the gallant officer, Gen. John McNeil.

[Circular No. 16, series of 1891, whole No. 79.]

MILITARY ORDER LOYAL LEGION OF THE UNITED STATES,
HEADQUARTERS COMMANDERY STATE OF MISSOURI,
St. Louis, November 7, 1891.

At a stated meeting of the commandery, held at the Laclede Hotel, St. Louis, on the above date, the following memorial was unanimously adopted:

IN MEMORIAM—GENERAL JOHN McNEIL.

On the 8th day of June, 1891, John McNeil, brevet major-general United States Volunteers and companion of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion, entered into rest. After a long and patriotic career he died in the fullness of years, respected and lamented. In honor of his memory his companions of the Missouri Commandery erect this memorial.

No man ever loved his country more ardently than John McNeil. In days that were darkest and amid trials that were sorest, he was from first to last the noncompromising defender of her integrity, and so closely linked together were his loyalty and his appreciation of duty, that between them neither policy nor expediency ever found a middle ground.

John McNeil was born of American parentage in Halifax, Nova Scotia, on the 4th day of February, 1813. After receiving a common-school education he learned the trade of a hatter in Boston, Mass., at the age of 16, and three years later he was president of the Mechanics' Apprentice Library Association. In 1832 he removed to New York and entered into copartnership with his father, and also became, while a resident of that city, a member of the famous New York Seventh Regiment. He settled in St. Louis in 1836, first taking a position in the employ of a Mr. McKee, and subsequently setting up for himself in the retail, and afterwards, upon Main street, in the wholesale hat business. In 1844-45 he was a member of the Missouri legislature, and from 1855 to 1861 was president of the Pacific Insurance Company. From the time of his settlement in St. Louis to the breaking out of the war he continued, however, to prosecute the business of a wholesale hat merchant.

On the 18th of May, 1861, he abandoned his business and entered the military service of the United States as colonel of the Third United States Reserve Corps, Missouri Volunteers. During April and May he was engaged in organizing the regiment at Turner Hall, and on the 10th of the latter month participated in the capture of Camp Jackson. On July 16 and 17 he was engaged in the capture of Fulton, Mo., and in the defeat of General Harris. After serving as post commander and provost-marshal of St. Louis until August, 1861, he was, on the 10th of that month, mustered out of service.

On the 1th of the following December he reentered the service as colonel of the Second Missouri (cavalry) State Militia. He engaged in actions of Walkerville, Mo., April 2 and 14, 1862, and on June 4 was assigned to the command of the district of northeast Missouri, with headquarters at Palmyra. He was in action against the enemy on June 26, 1862, and from July 28 to August 6 operated in the campaign against Porter's guerrillas in northern Missouri, engaging them at Whalleys Mills August 1, and in the battle of Kirksville August 5 and 6, where Porter's command of 3,000 men were dispersed. He was also in actions at Stockton August 6, Bragg's Farm September 13, and Shelbyville September 15. On the 23d of October he was assigned to the command of the eighth military district of Missouri, and engaged in operations in Lewis, Clark, Scotland, and Schuyler counties.

On the 20th of November, 1862, he was commissioned a brigadier-general "for gallant services north of the Missouri River." From December, 1862, to May, 1863, he operated against guerrillas in southeastern Missouri, being in action at Bloomfield March 1; in the expedition from that place March 9 to 15; in command at Cape Girardeau in April; in command against Marmaduke and pursuit from Cape Girardeau to Chalk Bluffs, Arkansas, April 17 to May 2; engaging in actions at Cape Girardeau April 20; Jackson and near White River, April 27; Castor River, April 29; Bloomfield, April 30; and Chalk Bluffs, on St. Francis River, May 1 and 2.

From July 15 to October 19, 1863, he commanded the district of southwestern Missouri, with headquarters at Springfield. He was in the campaign against Shelby from September 23 to October 26, being in action at Humansville October 16, and Buffalo Mountain October 24.

On the 20th of October he was assigned to command the district of the frontier, Department of the Missouri. From March to August, 1864, he commanded the district of Lafourche, Department of the Gulf, and subsequently (until September) the district of Rolla, Department of the Missouri.

On the 8th of October he was assigned to the command of the second brigade of the forces at Jefferson City, Mo., and operated against Price in his invasion of the State from September 24 to October 26, participating in the repulse of Price's attack on Jefferson, October 6 and 7; in actions at Brownsville, October 9 and 11; Little Blue, October 21; Independence, October 22; Big Blue, October 23; Coldwater Grove, October 24; Marais des Cygnes, and the rout of Price's army, October 25.

From October, 1864, to April, 1865, he commanded the district of central Missouri, and on the 12th of the latter month he resigned and was honorably mustered out of the service, having been on the same day brevetted a major-general of volunteers "for gallant and distinguished services during the war of the rebellion."

Thus for four long, bitter years, unallured by those grander and more brilliant campaigns which were heaping honors upon other men, did this brave soldier stand at his post of duty, and thus in the arena of a fierce and merciless border warfare did he battle against the forces which vainly struggled to wrest the great State of Missouri from her allegiance.

The importance of this work and the value of these services can only be estimated in the light of the disastrous results which must have followed the successful occupation of this great strategic section of the country by the powers of the rebellion. No more enduring monument can be built to the honor of our deceased companion than the page of history which will record that he was one of the leaders whose untiring energy saved this imperial State from the calamity and the crime of secession.

At the conclusion of the war General McNeil settled in St. Louis, and was soon appointed clerk of the criminal court. In 1866 he was elected sheriff of St. Louis County (then including the city of St. Louis), which office he held until 1871. He was a Centennial Commissioner from 1873 to 1876, also a United States Indian inspector until 1882. During 1883, and until June, 1886, he was chief inspector of United States customs. In 1887 he was assistant adjutant-general of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Missouri, and in 1890 was appointed to a position of trust in the St. Louis post-office. Although in apparent health, he died suddenly while in the discharge of his official duties.

It is a pleasure to record that as a citizen in the private walks of life General McNeil was modest in deportment and always courteous in address. Well-read, especially in historical literature, he was an interesting conversationalist, and rarely inaccurate in marshaling argumentative data. Despite adverse circumstances of fortune, he was cheerful, unobtrusive, free from jealousy, and never happier than in the society of his old comrades of the war, to whom he was devotedly attached. Beneath a natural ruggedness of character, and a crisp, stern manner of speech, he had a warm and tender heart, which often found expression in illy concealed emotion.

His consideration of the complex questions which grew out of the war was tempered by an earnest desire to eradicate the bitterness which four years of strife had engendered, and to create in the new life of the country a patriotism which should universally pervade the hearts of the American people. In grateful appreciation of his services for the preservation of the Union, the commandery of the State of Missouri enters this memorial upon its records, with instructions to the recorder to transmit a copy to the family of the deceased.

NELSON COLE,
THOS. WRIGHT,

Committee.

JAMES G. BUTLER,

Major, Commander.

W. R. HODGES,

Captain, United States Volunteers, Recorder.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to amend this bill by striking out "$100" and inserting "$50."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILNES. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$50" and inserting "$30."

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not now in order. The amendment to the amendment has been agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

ANN CATHERINE HULL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1734) to increase the pension of Ann Catherine Hull.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby directed to increase the pension of Ann Catherine Hull, widow of Commodore Joseph B. Hull, United States Navy, and that she be paid a pension of $60 per month.

The report (by Mr. ERDMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1734) to increase the pension of Ann Catherine Hull, respectfully submit the following report:

The beneficiary of this bill is the widow of Commodore J. B. Hull, who was appointed a midshipman in the United States Navy November 9, 1813, and was in active service continuously until July 16, 1822, when promoted to commodore and placed on the retired list. October 20, 1864, he was assigned to duty as commander of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, Pa., until January 1, 1866, when detached. He remained on the retired list, except when assigned to some special duty, until January 17, 1890, when he died at Philadelphia, Pa., having been in the United States naval service seventy-seven years.

Evidence has been presented to this committee which shows that the widow has only $240 per annum income, including her pension of $12 per month as a widow of a veteran of the war of 1812; that she is 62 years of age, in failing health, and that her income is not sufficient for her needs.

In view of these facts, the committee recommend that the bill do pass.
Appended is a statement of the service of Commodore J. B. Hull.

Very respectfully,

F. M. RAMSAY, Chief of Bureau.

HON. HENRY H. BINGHAM, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TALBERT. I hope we shall have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mrs. Hull is a constituent of mine. I recently called to see her with reference to this pension claim. I found her to be an old woman in failing health, dependent upon her needle for maintenance. Last year she made $96. She has been receiving a pension of $12 a month. Her husband performed active service for this Government fifty-seven years. During the last half dozen years of his life his health rapidly declined, so that he required very great personal care, and large expense was incurred in caring for him. He could not get a pension because he did not die of disease contracted in the service, but he literally died of old age; the machine had worn out. His widow is absolutely penniless, dependent solely upon her needle, and is in broken health. She simply asks that she may have the same rate of pension that has been given to the widows of officers occupying the same line of command that her husband deservedly occupied in the service for fifty-seven years. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN KEHL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of John Kehl and to restore him to his former rating.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to restore the rating of John Kehl, late of Company D, Ninth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, to the rate of $30 per month, as it was previous to July, 1869.

The report (by Mr. LAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of John Kehl, having carefully considered the evidence on file with the case, report as follows:

John Kehl, private, Company D, Ninth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, enlisted April 25, 1861, and was discharged January 30, 1866, after serving more than four years and nine months. June 30, 1866, he filed a declaration alleging rheumatism contracted in the service, established it by both medical and lay testimony, and on February 25, 1868, was granted a pension at $8 per month for rheumatism and resulting disease of heart. He was increased to $30 per month from May 29, 1888, for rheumatism and resulting disease of heart, and resulting locomotor ataxia. On April 8, 1892, a release was made to reduce his pension to $8 per month for rheumatism and resulting disease of heart and to drop locomotor ataxia, which was said by the medical referee to have been erroneously accepted as the result of rheumatism. A slip of the medical referee, attached to the Pension Office brief of the case, says:

"The medical certificates show clearly that syphilis is the principal if not the sole factor in this man's disability, and that all doubts are amply covered by the allowance of $8 per month."

The assumption of the medical referee that the locomotor ataxia was due to syphilis and not to causes arising in the service seems to be completely overthrown by the report of a medical examination made May 9, 1894, by the board of United States surgeons at Cincinnati, Ohio. The examination was made under special instructions from the Pension Office to determine whether syphilis was the cause of locomotor ataxia, and concludes as follows:

"In spite of the most painstaking examination, according to special instructions, we can not find any evidence of syphilis on skull, hair, skin, tibia, or other bones, mucous membrane, brain, heart, lungs, or other viscera and glands. It is the unanimous opinion of this board that claimant's locomotor ataxia is the result of exposure to wet and cold and rheumatism, not of syphilis. Wholly disabled for manual labor, he needs the regular and constant personal aid and attention of another person."

Your committee are of the opinion that the evidence shows conclusively that claimant's helpless condition is not due to his own vicious habits, but is due to the cause which has once been admitted by the Pension Office, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think I can satisfy the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] as to the merits of this case. This is the claim of a private soldier—just the sort of claim that this committee has been wanting to get hold of all this evening. [Laughter.] I want to say also that I have not been afflicted, as members of the House are aware, with the mouth disease, and therefore I shall take but one or two minutes to explain this case.

As the report shows, the pension originally allowed to this claimant was $8 a month. Upon an application for an increase he was reexamined and the pension was increased to $30 per month on May 29, 1888, for rheumatism and resulting disease of heart and resulting locomotor ataxia. In April, 1892, the pension was reduced to $8 per month—

Mr. TALBERT. Is that the amount he is now receiving?

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes, sir; it was reduced to this amount on the ground that his disability was due to his own vicious habits—was the result of syphilis. In thus reducing his pension a mistake was made in this way: When he was asked whether he had ever suffered from syphilis, he misunderstood the question by reason of his deafness; and supposing the examining surgeon had asked him whether he had ever had erysipelas, he replied that he had. As a matter of fact, he never had syphilitic disease. In 1894 a careful reexamination was made by the board of surgeons, and it was found there was no evidence that the man had ever had syphilis; there was nothing to indicate any of the results of that disease; and the board gave it as their unanimous opinion that the claimant's locomotor ataxia is the result of exposure to wet and cold and rheumatism—not syphilis.

This man is wholly incapacitated for the performance of manual labor. He needs regularly and constantly the attention of another person. I know him, and I know this is a worthy case.

Mr. TALBERT. I am opposed to increasing the pension in this case. I think a pension of $8 a month is sufficient.

Mr. BROMWELL. Under the general law this man would be entitled to $30.

Mr. TALBERT. I understand he is now drawing $8 a month. It seems to me that the testimony is exceedingly conflicting, and there seems to be something irregular about this matter.

Now, I am not disposed to do any injustice if I know it to any applicant here, but it seems to me that after he went before the special board of examiners authorized by the Pension Bureau and it was found that the statements made were entirely incorrect, and then goes outside and employs another board, and comes in and makes a contradictory statement in regard to his condition, that we should not allow an increase on such a flimsy pretext.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman allow me just a single word of correction?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. I do not think the gentleman understood my explanation in regard to the bill. I find it was not understood by gentlemen just behind me.

Mr. TALBERT. Very well; I would be very glad if the gentleman would repeat the statement in my time, and I will hold the floor.

Mr. BROMWELL. This claimant was asked if he had syphilis, and understood the question to be whether he ever had erysipelas. He replied that he had had erysipelas, and did not discover his mistake until he found that his pension had been reduced, for the board, on the strength of his own statement, reported that his disabilities were of syphilitic origin, and then, for the first time, he discovered the mistake he had made in answering the inquiry.

Mr. TALBERT. I understood that statement very well, but that does not explain the matter. I understand that the first board of examiners were the regularly authorized board, appointed by the Bureau—

Mr. BROMWELL. And so was the last one. They had the same authority as the first.

Mr. TALBERT. And they show exactly what the facts were in the case. Then he goes before another board, and a suggestion had been made to him by somebody, or somebody else, that he change the name of some of these things. Just like in the discussion the other day, when I wanted to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], who was speaking of the drunkenness of the governor of the Leavenworth Home, General Smith—I wanted to ask him what constituted, in his opinion, drunkenness. Some men have different opinions about that. Some of them will not admit that they are drunk as long as they can stand on a 10-acre field. Some men call it one thing and some another. Some say when they are drunk that it is not drunkenness that is the trouble, but they call it sickness; and I wanted to suggest that possibly this distinguished gentleman, when he got out of his buggy, as we were informed, and had to hold on by the wheels, that he might claim that he was feeling badly, that he was suffering, that he was sick, but not drunk.

I want to say that much in palliation of the gentleman's condition; and possibly when he dragged himself along up the steps to his door—I say possibly—the poor old fellow might claim that he was not drunk then either, but still sick. But here comes a man who has gone before a regular board of pension examiners, a board of physicians, who find he is not entitled to any more than $8 a month; that he has locomotor ataxia, or something else, I do not know what it is—I do not know what it means and I do not care—but he knew he could not get a pension beyond the amount that he is now drawing until somebody put it into his head to say he misunderstood a question propounded to him and gave the disease the wrong name.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that no such testimony as that ought to operate on a member of this House or on the Congress of the United States in granting a pension to any old soldier or anybody else. And the evidence shows just that state of things. The outside evidence explains it, and a gentleman, a distinguished member of this body, who sits just in front of me, who has looked over the whole matter and understands the case, suggested to me that that is just what it is; that it is only a change of name. That is all.

I am unwilling, if I can prevent it, to see the pension increased in this case over $8 a month. I think that is enough. I do not think there is any justification or any ground whatever for increasing the pension beyond that. I see no reason for paying any attention to a claim that comes in here under an assumed name, and asks us to jump it right up to $30 a month. I do not think we ought to allow such a rating of disability in this case. Why, that is even worse than the man who comes in, as we had a case some time ago, and produces testimony to show that he went beyond death six-eighths. [Laughter.] It grows worse and worse.

Mr. AVERY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. AVERY. On what theory would you give this man $8 a month if the disease that he suffers from is the result of syphilis? Why give him $8 or give him anything?

Mr. TALBERT. Well, he had some disease; there is no doubt of that. He had rheumatism, and had sufficient disability to entitle him to $8 a month, and the board recommended that. He was drawing it, but was not satisfied, and wanted to get a higher rate for the disability, and rob and plunder the Treasury, as a good many others are trying to do all the time. I say I am not willing to consent to it myself, and such a pension can not pass the House if I am able to prevent it.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour has arrived when the committee must rise in pursuance to the rule.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. LACEY having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HERBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration business on the Private Calendar, under the special rule, had directed him to report to the House sundry bills with various recommendations.

And then, the hour of 10 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. having arrived, the Speaker pro tempore declared the House adjourned, under the rule, until 12 o'clock to-morrow, Saturday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 18, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 8293) making appropriations to supply deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe it is usual to reserve points of order against this bill, and I desire to reserve all points of order.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that at the earliest practicable moment I shall ask the House to consider the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] reserves all points of order.

NAVAL TRAINING STATION, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 744) providing for a naval training station on the island of Yerba Buena (or Goat Island), in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal., and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a training station for naval apprentices on the island of Yerba Buena (or Goat Island), in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal.; and said Secretary is authorized to designate two officers of the Navy, and the Secretary of War is authorized to designate one officer of the Army, said three officers to constitute a board, who shall select and assign so much of said island as may be necessary for the purpose of establishing said naval training station; and the site so selected, when approved by the President, shall be, by virtue of this act, transferred to the Navy Department for the purposes of said naval training station.

SEC. 2. That all apprentices of the Navy, whether at a training station or on board an apprentice training ship, shall be additional to the number of enlisted persons allowed by law for the Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. HILBORN. The report will give a sufficient explanation.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object, or reserve the right to object?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I simply ask to have some explanation of the bill. If the gentleman desires to have the report read, that may be done, or the gentleman can make an explanation.

Mr. HILBORN. The report is short.

The report (by Mr. HILBORN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 744) providing for a naval training station on the island of Yerba Buena (or Goat Island), in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal., and for other purposes, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report the same back with a recommendation that it do pass.

The committee adopt as its report the Senate Report No. 106, Fifty-fourth

Congress, first session, made by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, namely:

"The committee recommend the passage of the bill in its new draft. There is need at the present time of increased efforts to educate the boys of the country to become seamen of the Navy. They can be enlisted between the ages of 16 and 18 to serve until they arrive at the age of 21 years, not, however, without the consent of their parents or guardians. They can be trained partly on the shore and partly in the practice ships, and the good effects of the system have been made apparent by many years of experience. Much real benefit is derived from the boys while they are undergoing their apprenticeship, and later when they enlist, as most of them do, as seamen, they make the best possible recruits for the Navy.

"The establishment at Coasters Harbor Island, in Narragansett Bay, of a training station has been fruitful of good results. A similar establishment is needed upon the Pacific Coast, and unless it is provided no apprentices can be enlisted on that coast. This impossibility works injustice to the boys there who desire to enlist, and is injurious to the Government, which needs to train and utilize them as it does boys upon the other coasts of the country. There is ample room for the Pacific home station upon Goat Island, near San Francisco, and the Navy Department will have no difficulty in providing a suitable training ship, so that the education and discipline of the boys will not be carried on too much on land, but may be conducted mainly upon the water. No possible objection can be conceived to the passage of the bill authorizing part of Goat Island to be taken for the buildings for the shore station, and transferring so much of the island as may be necessary to the control of the Navy Department for the purposes of the station.

"The bill contains a provision that the boys constituting the naval apprentices shall be an addition to the total number of seamen in the Navy allowed by law, and not be counted as a part thereof. The vessels of the new navy are requiring all the seamen now by law allowed, and indeed the number ought to be considerably increased in accordance with bills now pending in Congress with that end in view. To the present bill, therefore, is added a provision that all boys who may be enlisted as naval apprentices to serve until they are 21 shall be additional to the number of enlisted persons allowed by law for the Navy. This provision, unless previously made a law in some other bill, ought to remain and be adopted as a part of the present bill, as clearly appears from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, dated January 13, 1896, and hereto annexed.

"NAVY DEPARTMENT.
Washington, January 15, 1896.

"Sir: I herewith return to you the bill providing for a naval training station on the island of Yerba Buena (or Goat Island), in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal., and for other purposes, together with my opinion, as requested.

"The establishment of a training station for naval apprentices at San Francisco, Cal., would undoubtedly benefit the naval service and would greatly assist the Department in its efforts to have the enlisted force of the United States Navy composed entirely of American citizens. The proviso in Senate bill No. 744, 'That all apprentices of the Navy, while at a training station or on board of an apprentice training ship, shall be additional to the number of enlisted persons allowed by law for the Navy,' is absolutely necessary for the success of the apprentice system.

"There being now no United States merchant marine, the Navy is obliged to depend upon its apprentice system to supply it with seamen and petty officers, and it is therefore necessary that there shall be enlisted annually the full number of apprentices permitted by the law. The law now in force regarding the enlistment of apprentices authorizes 750 to be enlisted annually, provided the total number of enlisted persons, including apprentices, does not exceed 10,000.

"The demand for enlisted men for crews on the new vessels recently commissioned has forced the Department, during the past two years, to reduce the number of enlistments of apprentices, so that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, only 561 apprentices were enlisted, and during the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, only 548 could be enlisted. Since November 16, 1895, it has been necessary to stop all enlistments for apprentices.

"Very respectfully,

"H. A. HERBERT, Secretary.

"Hon. J. DONALD CAMERON, Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate."

Mr. HILBORN. The only purpose of the bill is to allow some of the 750 boys permitted to be enlisted in the Navy to be enlisted on the Pacific Coast. They are now all enlisted on the Atlantic Coast at one place. It is deemed advisable that some of them—such number as the Secretary of the Navy may see fit—should be enlisted on the Pacific Coast. There is no appropriation in the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I understood from the report, the Secretary of the Navy recommends and indorses this bill.

Mr. HILBORN. Yes; he recommends it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HILBORN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following bill; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

The message also announced that the Presiding Officer appointed

A bill (S. 682) for the relief of the heirs of Sterling T. Austin, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

Resolution—

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the House, in compliance with its request, a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 716) "to correct the naval history of John C. Dull."

To the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. W. MARSTON.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 69) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims of the legal representatives of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union Agency, Ind. T., for services and expenses.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be examined and audited the claims of the legal representatives of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union Agency, Ind. T., for services rendered and expenses incurred by him in the months of July, August, September, and October, in the year 1878, which claims were transmitted to the office of Indian Affairs about November in said year, and to pay to his legal representatives whatever sum of money may be found to be justly due to him for such services and expenses, not exceeding in amount the sum of $448.10; and a sufficient sum of money to pay the amount so found to be due is hereby appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman ought to make some explanation.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the report states very explicitly the character of this bill, but it is hardly necessary to read it, I suppose. This was an Indian agency that had been abolished. The Secretary of the Interior ordered the agent to remain there to take care of the Government property until such time as they could settle everything. This is simply to pay for the services which he rendered to the Government after the agency was abolished, until the Government property could be removed. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs both approve it, and say it is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COBB of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ELBRIDGE M'FADDEN.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5999) to correct the military record of Elbridge McFadden.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to correct the military record, remove the charge of desertion, and grant an honorable discharge to Elbridge McFadden, late of Company I, Thirty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask the gentleman if this bill has been considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. DINGLEY. No; it has not been. It is a bill to correct a military record. It comes from the Military Committee, and not from the Pensions Committee. There is no objectionable feature connected with it at all.

Mr. TALBERT. It is a bill that should properly come before the Friday night sessions. It is a bill to remove the charge of desertion, is it not?

Mr. DINGLEY. It is to correct a record, and although it stands nominally as such, yet as a matter of fact it is not anything of that kind. No pension is involved.

Mr. TALBERT. Is it merely to correct a military record, or to give him a pension?

Mr. DINGLEY. It is to correct the record of a man who would not be entitled to a pension anyway. I will say, if I may be allowed a moment, that this is to correct the military record of Elbridge McFadden, a soldier of a New York regiment, who enlisted at the age of 10, served two years in the Peninsular campaign, was in all the battles of the Peninsular campaign from 1861 to the autumn of 1863—a gallant soldier. Then he received notice that he would be appointed as a captain in one of the colored brigades in which his brother was an officer, and after delay he obtained a furlough for the purpose of going to accept this new position, but on account of delay the expedition sailed before his arrival. He immediately left for his home, thinking he would there receive information, but he did not receive it, and while he was waiting for this he was taken down ill and was unable to return in season. The report says, without reading it in detail:

The facts in this case clearly justify the conclusion that in separating from his command, the Thirty-eighth New York Volunteers, the beneficiary was not actuated by any design or purpose to desert, but became separated therefrom by reason of proper orders and in conformity with a furlough for the purpose of uniting with Ullman's brigade.

It was not desertion, or an intent to desert, and the committee therefore thinks the charge ought to be removed. I may say that, being a strong man, and standing well among his neighbors, there is no ultimate intention of applying for a pension. It is simply to give him an honorable discharge.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two. He was a soldier who was seeking a commission as an officer?

Mr. DINGLEY. He sought none.

Mr. LOUD. He was supposed to be, no doubt, a man of ordinary intelligence.

Mr. DINGLEY. He was a boy of 19 years.

Mr. LOUD. Still he was supposed to be a man of ordinary intelligence?

Mr. DINGLEY. I take it for granted that he was.

Mr. LOUD. And he should have known that all he had to do was to report to his own regiment or to some other command during the war and secure his honorable discharge.

Mr. DINGLEY. All the facts have been laid before the committee, and they seem to justify not only this recommendation, but clearly to show that he served for two years and participated in all the battles in Virginia for two years; and having done so, that he should receive an honorable discharge.

Mr. LOUD. Why should we give a discharge to a man who was a deserter?

Mr. DINGLEY. I state the facts, and will not argue the matter.

Mr. LOUD. Here was a man competent to be an officer, supposed to be familiar with all the rules and regulations governing war service, and he ought to know that all he would have had to do would be to report to a hospital or to his own regiment and that he then could have received an honorable discharge.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman remember that he was taken sick?

Mr. LOUD. Did he remain sick until after May, 1865?

Mr. DINGLEY. I can not say how long.

Mr. LOUD. I think that this is a cold case of desertion, as the gentleman will find if he makes a close examination of the matter. This man did not want to go back as a private.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the circumstances do not warrant any such conclusion, nor did the committee reach such a conclusion. Certainly I would not ask to have a bill of this character considered except where justice required that the charge be removed.

Mr. OWENS. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear the report of the committee.

The report (by Mr. GRIFFIN) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5990) to correct the military record of Elbridge McFadden, having had the same under consideration, report thereon as follows:

It is shown by the records that E. McFadden (also borne as Elbridge McFadden), aged 19 years, was enrolled and mustered into service June 15, 1861, as a private in Company G, Fourth Maine Infantry Volunteers, to serve three years. He was transferred to Company I, Thirty-eighth New York Infantry Volunteers, September 23, 1861, and to Company E, same regiment, in October or November, 1862. He appears to have served faithfully until May 17, 1860, when he is reported as having deserted while on furlough; that no record has been found that he returned to his command or to military control; that in an application for an honorable discharge, involving removal of the charge of desertion, McFadden testified May 12, 1884, that on March 11, 1863, he received an appointment as second lieutenant in Ullman's brigade, and was ordered to report at headquarters in New York City; that he was not allowed to go until the officers had also received an order; that on April 11, 1863, he received a furlough to go to New York City, was furnished with his descriptive list, and told that he would be mustered out of service and commissioned as a second lieutenant; that when he arrived in the city he was told that the expedition had been gone four days.

The records show that Elbridge McFadden was ordered to report to Brigadier-General Ullman for assignment to his expedition and for appointment as an officer of United States colored troops, but nothing has been found showing that he was commissioned as such; that in a letter dated April 6, 1880, the soldier stated that he failed to report on March 11, 1863, because he had received an order from General Ullman to report to his headquarters in New York City, having received an appointment from Governor Coburn as a lieutenant in Ullman's brigade; that he was delayed by his officers until he procured a furlough; that when he arrived in New York City he found that the expedition under General Ullman had been gone four days, and that there was no one to whom he could report; that he did all in his power to get there, but that through somebody's blunder he was prevented from getting his commission; that the application for relief in this case has been repeatedly denied by the War Department, and now stands denied, the soldier not having been prevented from completing his term of enlistment by reason of disability contracted in the line of duty, and the case not coming within any of the other provisions of the act approved March 2, 1880.

It appears that these facts are in the main corroborated by the subsequent affidavit of Orrin McFadden, now judge of probate of the county of Lincoln, in the State of Maine, and who became a lieutenant-colonel in the Eightieth Regiment United States Colored Troops, which formed a part of Ullman's brigade, and who is a brother of the beneficiary. Judge McFadden also states in such affidavit, made January 28, 1890, that he was himself appointed captain in the brigade of Gen. Daniel Ullman and given the privilege of nominating his second lieutenant, and accordingly nominated the beneficiary; that General Ullman's adjutant-general, upon being given the company and regiment in which Elbridge McFadden was serving, assured Capt. Orrin McFadden that the necessary orders would be forwarded to enable the beneficiary to join the brigade at 230 Broadway, New York, where the organization was then being perfected. Delay occurring, he again went to brigade headquarters to see about it and was informed that it was all right—that the order would be sent; that later Elbridge informed Captain McFadden that a blunder had been made in sending the order direct to Elbridge instead of to his commanding officers, and again Captain McFadden applied to General Ullman's adjutant and received the assurance that the matter should be straightened out, and afterwards that it had been straightened and that Elbridge would be right along; that on April 9 the brigade was ordered on board vessel for New Orleans and that Elbridge had not yet arrived.

Captain McFadden, believing that he would be there in a day or two, addressed a letter to Elbridge and deposited it in the post-office at New York, giving him directions such as he had received from General Ullman, to enable Elbridge to follow the command to New Orleans; that they were seven or eight days on passage to New Orleans, and on his arriving there he wrote home, but did not repeat the directions given in the letter to his brother which was deposited in the New York post-office, not doubting that such former letter had been received; that the siege of Port Hudson came on soon after, and that the mails were very slow between New Orleans and the North.

The beneficiary states in his affidavit, made on the 2d day of January, 1880, that upon receiving his furlough to enable him to go to New York to join Ullman's brigade, which occurred a month after the order had been received by him, he started for New York, but was delayed in Washington from Saturday until Monday to get four months' pay, and did not arrive in New York until April 13, 1863; that he promptly called at 230 Broadway, New York, but found the place closed; that he then went to the hotel where his brother, Captain McFadden, had boarded and learned that Ullman's brigade had sailed four days previously, but could learn nothing further; that he went to the post-office, believing that Captain McFadden had left a letter for him, but did not get one, and that the letter which his brother had written him he had no doubt had been put in the advertisement delivery, and that he, through ignorance, did not call there for it; that, being unable to learn anything, the beneficiary went home to Dresden, Me., thinking that his brother, the Captain, had perhaps sent the needed information there, but again he met with disappointment; that he regarded his furlough as a virtual discharge from the Thirty-eighth New York, and waited in Dresden, still expecting to receive the needed information, but that it did not come; that for several weeks previous to receiving the furlough he had been afflicted with chronic diarrhea, and was much enfeebled by the disease and considered that to go back to his company in Virginia would seem like going to his death, and so he waited day after day in the vain hope of receiving the information that would enable him to join Ullman's brigade, until so much time had elapsed that he feared punishment if he went back; that he was thoroughly discouraged, and went to Vermont and sought employment on a farm, and there remained until the war ended.

The facts in this case clearly justify the conclusion that in separating from his command, the Thirty-eighth New York Volunteers, the beneficiary was not actuated by any design or purpose to desert, but became separated therefrom by reason of proper orders and in conformity with a furlough for the purpose of uniting with Ullman's brigade; and it is equally clear that his failure so to do was due to circumstances over which he had no control, viz, the delay in the transmission of the order through the proper channels for his transfer to Ullman's brigade, and also that which occurred in procuring his furlough and the time consumed in making his journey to New York, in consequence of which he did not reach the latter city until after Ullman's brigade had departed. These circumstances absolutely refute any intention on his part up to this point to abandon the service or to desert the flag of his country.

His subsequent efforts to obtain information that would enable him to join the brigade to which he was assigned, as detailed in his affidavit and in a measure corroborated by the affidavit of Judge McFadden, also negative the idea of any present intention to desert; and he may well, without any such intention, have waited in expectation of receiving proper orders or instructions for joining the command until he became alarmed because of the consequence of his absence from the Thirty-eighth New York Regiment without having in the meantime joined Ullman's brigade, as was contemplated. According to his own statement he became discouraged, and then, impressed with the belief that if he returned to Virginia, where his command was the affliction with which he states he was suffering, and in consequence of which he became enfeebled, might prove fatal, he became as a result somewhat demoralized, as young men of his age often did, and, without any willful intent to desert, went home and remained out of the service.

It is clear to your committee that the desertion in this case was due to a combination of unfortunate circumstances over which the beneficiary had no control. While he was the subject, he did not produce them, and hence, without any deliberate purpose to leave the service, his environments ultimately were such that he became a passive subject of these circumstances, and thus without active responsibility was placed in the position stated in the record. The high standing of the beneficiary as a citizen is vouched for by those of unquestioned reputation to whom he is personally known, and in view of the fact that his service in the Thirty-eighth New York Volunteers was honorable and creditable, having participated in the battles of Bull Run, Fredericksburg, and the Peninsula campaign, together with his youth and inexperience, having been but 19 years of age when he enlisted in 1861, your committee believe that he should not be held to that strict accountability which would justify a refusal to grant his request, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

During the reading,

Mr. OWENS. I withdraw the demand for the reading of the report. I am satisfied.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill. Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word or two in regard to the passage of this bill if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. TALBERT. I have taken the position heretofore that these matters ought to come up regularly and be considered at the regular Friday night sessions, at times that are specially devoted to this class of claims. It seems to me that they ought to be brought up there and considered; and I submit this continually bringing in and asking unanimous consent for these outrageous claims ought to be stamped out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please suspend. The House must be in order. It is impossible to hear what the gentleman says.

Mr. TALBERT. I think it is wrong to continually press such claims as this for unanimous consent when so much time is given on Friday afternoons and Friday evenings for these special claims. I submit that, while not objecting now to the claim itself, I do not want to be put in a wrong position; and then, in the second place, I can not understand why it is gentlemen will continually bring in here and urge the claims of deserters, to remove the charge of desertion, when there are so many other claims of brave and gallant soldiers who stood by their arms from the beginning to the end of the war, and we hear very little of those claims being urged before this House. Let justice be first done where deserving.

Now, sir, while I am upon that subject, I desire to have a letter read from an old soldier, only to call attention to these things. I do not know him. It is strange his claim has not been brought up here instead of this one and unanimous consent asked for its consideration, in preference to cases of deserters. I am tired of hearing these claims for deserters and bummers, and I think also that these cases ought to all be considered at the Friday night sessions.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. PITNEY. I will ask the gentleman if, in the Friday night session last night, he did not raise the point of order against a bill of this character, that it must be considered in the House and not at the Friday night session?

Mr. TALBERT. Not in this class of cases. This class of cases properly come up on the Friday evening sessions.

Mr. PITNEY. It was a bill removing the charge of desertion.

Mr. TALBERT. What is the case?

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman talks so much on the Friday night sessions that he does not remember it. I call his attention to the RECORD of yesterday, page 4137. A bill to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Peter Fleming was reached on the Calendar, and Mr. TALBERT said:

Mr. Chairman, I ask that that bill be passed over for to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order against the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, sir; I do not think this bill properly comes up for consideration under the special order.

Mr. TALBERT. That was something in regard to the sentence of a court-martial. That was a case to correct the record, and I made that point of order; and as I was informed that it was an exceptional case, I withdrew my objection. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] came up and said that this old fellow had lost both his feet, and that he was taken or would be taken to the Soldiers' Home to be taken care of without a pension; and I said, "Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my objection, notwithstanding the case should not come up at a Friday night session." Now, this man, I understand, is a young man who deserted, and has both feet and both hands; and I submit it is wrong to continue to press such cases when you have more meritorious cases that have not been considered. I ask that the Clerk read that letter, which has a bearing on what I have to say; and I desire to say that I feel it to be my duty to protect the great mass of the people from the burden of being taxed to pay such claims.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I object to the reading of that letter.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from South Carolina asks to have it read as a part of his remarks, of course that is in order.

Mr. TALBERT. I will read it myself, in my own time.

Mr. DINGLEY. As that letter refers to another matter, will not the gentleman have the kindness to take some other time for having it read?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I submit that I have a right to have that letter read, and I appeal to the Speaker to decide it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask the Clerk to read the letter. I submit that I like to see fairness and justice on this floor, as I intend to be fair and just to everybody here. That letter came to me only this morning. I do not know the old soldier who wrote it; possibly somebody here may recognize him when the letter is read; perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] may know something about him. The letter speaks for itself.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

ELIZABETH CITY, N. C., April 17.

DEAR SIR: As an ex-Union soldier in great distress, I take the liberty to address you. My record before the committee will show that I done my "duty at the front." A bill, No. 321, has passed the Senate for my increase of pension. I will most respectfully call your attention to the unjust amendment made by the committee. After being fully convinced that I am in my present helpless condition, and that this condition is directly traceable to the wound received in 1863 there can be no doubt—and then, without assigning any reason for it, reduce me to $60 per month, when every board of surgeons have rated me at $72. Had they given me $100 it would have been more patriotic and more like equity for the long suffering that I have endured and must endure for life. I have had the payment of rent and a chattel mortgage on all of our household goods extended until June. If not paid then I must lose all, and with my wife become a public charge. Mrs. Dunn has become entirely broken down in health with years of effort to keep me from the almshouse. If it is agreeable for you to defeat that amendment and get for me what you consider my case merits without jeopardizing or causing any material delay, I certainly will appreciate your kindness. I have written Hon. GALUSHA A. GROW relative to the matter, but do not know what action he will take.

Yours, fraternally,
JAMES W. DUNN,
Company E, Ninety-third Pennsylvania Volunteers.

Hon. W. JASPER TALBERT, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TALBERT. That letter speaks for itself, and I think it is a sad commentary upon the pretended desire of the Republican party to do justice to the old soldiers that they have to appeal to me, a representative from the South, and a Democrat, to seek justice for them [laughter]; but I will, am willing and glad to do it; at the same time to do justice to my own people at home by opposing unjust legislation. It is on behalf of men like the writer of that letter that I raise my voice here against the constant bringing in of these bills to remove charges of desertion from men who were not soldiers, who always had their backs to the enemy—"bummers" and "coffee coolers"—and I put this House upon notice now that I shall object to the passage of all bills of that character that have not first been considered at a Friday night session. I shall do this in no factional spirit, but upon principle and justice and right.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have simply to say that in this case the soldier served over two years and was in six of the great battles of the war, so that he can not be properly described as one of those who "always had their backs to the enemy." I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 6886) granting to Major C. A. Angel Post, No. 20, Grand Army of the Republic, of Lambertville, N. J., 4 condemned cannon and 20 cannon balls, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to Major C. A. Angel Post, No. 20, Grand Army of the Republic, of Lambertville, N. J., 4 condemned cannon and 20 cannon balls, for the decoration of the soldiers' monument of said city: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am reluctant to interpose an objection, but for satisfactory reasons I shall object in this case.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, being a bill (H. R. 7173) donating four condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Allegan, Mich.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Allegan, Mich., four condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls for the monument to be erected in said town: Provided, That in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy such articles can be spared without detriment to the public interest: And provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not in order to put two bills together in this way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman ought to hear the amendment reported before he makes his point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will hear the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding: "And also to Major C. A. Angel Post, No. 20, Grand Army of the Republic, of Lambertville, N. J., 4 condemned cannon and 20 cannon balls for the decoration of the soldiers' monument of said city."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of good legislation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMPANY I, SEVENTH IOWA INFANTRY VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to correct the muster roll of Company I, Seventh Regiment of Iowa Infantry Volunteers, so as to show that said company was enrolled in the service on the 15th day of July, 1861.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. The report in this case is quite long, but I can explain the matter very briefly. In the Fifty-first Congress I introduced a bill to correct the muster rolls of this regiment to make them date uniformly on the 15th of July, 1861, the actual date of enlistment. The Secretary of War reported that action by Congress was not necessary, as he could make the correction himself, and he made an order to that effect. Afterwards it was ascertained that by mistake the rolls of Company I had been erroneously dated. The Secretary then issued an order vacating so much of his previous order as related to that company.

Mr. TALBERT. There is no question of desertion involved?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, no; it requires Congressional action to make the rolls of this company uniform with the others.

Mr. LOUD. What is the object of the bill?

Mr. LACEY. The object is this: These men enlisted on the 15th of July, 1861, but they were mustered in on the 24th. By mistake the rolls were dated the 24th instead of the 15th, and this is to make the rolls of this company conform to the fact, the same as the other companies' rolls.

Mr. LOUD. Is it not correct as it is?

Mr. LACEY. No; the rolls should have been dated the day the men actually enlisted. All of the nine companies have had their rolls corrected already by the Secretary of War, but by a mistake in the dating of the rolls in this case, the company could not avail itself of the benefit of the order of the Secretary.

Mr. LOUD. In my own case my enlistment antedated my enrollment, and I do not know why I should seek to have it changed.

Mr. LACEY. If, as a matter of fact, the date is wrong it should be corrected, and if the point were made the Secretary of War would correct it.

Mr. LOUD. What is to be obtained by this? What is the object?

Mr. LACEY. The object is this: The bounty law was changed on the 21st of July, and this muster roll as it stands leaves nine companies under one bounty law and this company under another law.

Mr. SPALDING. What is the object of this bill—to give extra pay?

Mr. LOUD. I would like to inquire how many hundred dollars are involved? How much bounty will be paid?

Mr. LACEY. I do not know. A few men—the number I can not precisely state—were discharged inside of two years and their rights are affected. Most of the men, however, served three years and "veteranized."

Mr. LOUD. How much bounty is involved—$100 to each?

Mr. LACEY. It would be $100 under the first enlistment.

Mr. LOUD. Very well; this is only a few dollars more; I guess we can stand it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FRANCIS MILLET.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration and adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 1800) for the relief of Francis Millet, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1857, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

Mr. LOUD. What is this case?

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this a proposition to refer a claim to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact, and without authority to render judgment?

Mr. CLARDY. This is a claim for property taken during the war. The resolution proposes simply to refer the claim with all the papers to the Court of Claims.

Mr. LOUD. What amount of money is involved?

Mr. CLARDY. A little over $2,000, I think, in all.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to know what kind of property was taken. I believe I will ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. CLARDY. It is short.

The report of the Committee on War Claims (by Mr. PUGH) was read.

Mr. LOUD. As that report gives no information in relation to the claim, I shall be compelled to object.

ANTHONY O'GRADY.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, and that it be placed on its passage.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3671) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Anthony O'Grady, alias John Davis.

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion appearing on the records of the Adjutant-General United States Army against Anthony O'Grady, alias John Davis, late private of Company F, Nineteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and that a certificate of honorable discharge as of Company F, Nineteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, be issued to said soldier.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. TALBERT. I object.

Mr. CANNON. Just one word, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly. I withdraw my objection for the present.

Mr. CANNON. For the first time in twenty years, I have asked unanimous consent to pass a bill. The beneficiary in this case is a constituent of mine—almost blind and totally disabled. He enlisted in the Army, as appears from the record, in the State of Massachusetts. In a terrific battle near the close of the war he had the palm of his hand torn off and his sight destroyed for two years. He was absent when his regiment was mustered out. He is noted on the records of the State of Massachusetts as "mustered out sick." But he has never received any discharge from the Federal Army. He is now old and dependent. The facts of the case coming to my knowledge, they appealed to me, and I greatly desire to have the bill passed.

Mr. TALBERT. Because this is an exceptional case, and for the personal reasons stated, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the House proceeded to consider it.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, to add to the bill the words "to date from April 30, 1865," was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR SOLDIERS' MONUMENT, ST. JOHNSBURY, VT.

Mr. GROUT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 122) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to deliver condemned cannon to Chamberlain Post, Grand Army of the Republic, to be posted by the soldiers' monument at St. Johnsbury, Vt.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to Chamberlain Post, Grand Army of the Republic, to be posted by the soldiers' monument in St. Johnsbury, Vt., 2 light pieces of condemned cannon and 20 cannon balls: Provided, That said delivery shall be made without expense to the United States Government and without detriment to the naval service.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the resolution to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PICKLER. Are amendments in order?

The SPEAKER. Amendments are in order if—they are in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to have the bill amended by adding the clause which I send to the desk, to which I think nobody will object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the joint resolution these words:

"To each State and Territorial department of the Grand Army of the Republic eight pieces of condemned cannon, to be delivered to said departments of the Grand Army of the Republic upon order of the commander of the department and without cost to the Government."

Mr. GROUT. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point for a moment. Let me say that my amendment proposes a fair way to distribute these cannon. The Grand Army of the Republic is organized in each State and Territory as a State or Territorial department. This will give to each State, treating all of them alike, eight pieces of cannon, and then when they have the annual meetings they can ship the pieces from place to place where the meetings are to be held or divide them up if necessary among the different posts in the manner best calculated to meet the wishes of the Grand Army men. It will give to all an equal number without favoritism, and place them upon an exact and equal footing. It is a fair proposition, and saves the taking of these cannon away and putting them in specially favored or out of the way places. I repeat, this treats all alike; and I can say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I am sure it will meet the approval of the Grand Army men throughout the country. We ought to have this distribution made evenly and upon some regular basis, and not let the man who happens to get in first have the right to secure these guns to the exclusion of all others.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it the gentleman's proposition to give eight pieces to each State and Territory?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I hope the point of order will be insisted upon.

Mr. PICKLER. Let me say to the gentleman that each State is organized as one department, and this will give all of the States an equal number.

Mr. MEREDITH. Are we manufacturing condemned cannon for distribution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to suggest to the gentleman from South Dakota, who makes his appeal to me, that I am not making the point of order against the amendment because of any objection to the method of distribution proposed by the gentleman. I have not objected to the consideration of a single application of this kind, nor shall I do so, so far as I know. But what I do object to is the vicious legislation that this proposes, because if you can couple bills of this character together, you can couple all of the pension bills together now pending before the House and pass them as amendments any time you get a single pension case before this body. You can couple every war claim and put them on a single bill in the same manner.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; but there is no money in this.

Mr. RICHARDSON (continuing). And the bill may be ever so meritorious as an amendment proposed, but it is not proper legislation; nor is it, on the other hand, because of the fact that the bill has no merit; the objection is to the principle involved and not to the matter. It is simply an objection made in the interest of good legislation.

If the gentleman's measure is so highly meritorious, as he seems to think it is, I have no doubt that the able Speaker, the discreet Speaker of this House, will recognize the gentleman at any time when the public business will permit in order to get consideration before the House for his measure.

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman will allow me, I think it was just about two months ago, when the House had a flood of bills of this character coming in every day, applications from all over the country from one place or another, and on my suggestion, on motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the whole subject was referred to the Naval Committee with an understanding that they would report some bill that would dispose of the question. It seems, though, that there has been no such report, and now the single bills are coming in again, as we have seen in the last day or two—the same flood we had of them before.

It seems to me that under the circumstances the House ought, so as to avoid any appearance of favoritism in such a matter as this, give to each one of the State and Territorial departments the eight pieces of cannon recommended in my amendment. The distribution is certainly fair if made in that way. Then the departments of the Grand Army in all of the States will have the pieces and can control them. I repeat, it is a fair and equitable distribution, and it will satisfy the Grand Army men in all the States and Territories. I hope the objection will not be made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is not the very measure you describe pending before the same committee that reports this bill?

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir; not in form—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, why not put it in form and send it to the committee and have it considered there?

Mr. PICKLER. The instructions of the committee were to report the matter; and it is in form, so far as that is concerned. But owing, as I suppose, to the multitudinous cares and business before the committee, they have not reported it.

The gentleman will see that this artillery, available for the purpose contemplated, is being rapidly exhausted. It goes to the man who can get in first, or who pushes ahead of the rest, while the modest man, like myself [laughter], will never get a piece unless we can have a fair distribution by some systematic arrangement such as I have proposed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the legislation is vicious. The only place where we allow matters to be bunched together or grouped as the gentleman proposes is in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; but that is where there is money involved. I do not see what possible objection there could be to settling the matter in this simple way; and I hope the point of order will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order against the amendment, and the Chair must sustain it.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Is this matter open for debate now?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know whose bill this is, Mr. Speaker, for I have not paid attention to that fact. But no matter whose bill it is, I hope it will be voted down.

It is not fair to the members of this House and the other States and Grand Army posts, and the different cemeteries in the country where they want this artillery, to have these guns grabbed up in this manner as the members manage to get their bills rushed to the front. It has not been two months ago since this House, in order to avoid this very condition of things, requested one of its committees to report a plan for a fair distribution of the guns. Something of that kind ought to be done, and until it is done these independent measures ought not to be allowed to pass. I hope the bill, therefore, will be voted down in order to get a fair distribution.

Mr. MEREDITH. The poor fellows in the cemeteries are in no hurry to get the guns now.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not yet been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; that is the pending question.

The question was taken on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and it was agreed to.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. PICKLER. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. PICKLER. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that this bill be recommitted to the committee from which it was reported.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 1, noes 60.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the House do now adjourn. Is it not time for the special order, fixed for 1 o'clock?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House is dividing and that the question must be disposed of.

Mr. PICKLER. On which question is the House dividing?

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing on the question of recommitment. The yeas have it, and the bill is ordered to be read a third time.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GROUT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. PICKLER. I want to give notice that this is the last one of these bills—

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE COGSWELL.

The SPEAKER. The time fixed for the special order has arrived.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM COGSWELL, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, his office who seeks to construct in enduring form a just estimate of the life and character of one who has so recently departed from the midst of living men that the glance of the eye and the sound of the voice seem hardly yet a memory is never easy of accomplishment. He must neither degenerate into mere fulsome eulogy which overshoots the mark nor fail in due appreciation of the great qualities which deserve commemoration. The difficulties and dangers of the duty, always sufficiently manifest, are multiplied in the case of the man whose memory we honor to-day.

WILLIAM COGSWELL was the most modest of men. He was impatient of eulogy. If we could respect his wishes, if we could accept his own estimate of himself, we should be silent at this hour. But that can not be. His life, so full of splendid achievement, demands a higher measure of praise than he would willingly receive.

I know how poor are the words which I shall speak. At the most, I can expect to recite his history only in meager outline, leaving it to the loving touch of others to delineate the beauty of its detail.

There can be no complete knowledge of an individual unless we know of what manner of men he was born. WILLIAM COGSWELL owed much to his ancestry. They were of English origin. He was descended from John Cogswell, who appears to have been a man of substance and position in Westbury Leigh, county of Wilts, where he owned and managed a woolen mill which had been in the family for many generations. When about 43 years of age he sailed from Bristol with his wife and eight children in search of a new home across the Atlantic. The voyage began on June 4, 1635, in the ship Angel Gabriel, and ended in shipwreck on the inhospitable shores of Maine in the great storm of August 15 of that year. The Cogswells were among the saved, and with little delay the family proceeded to Ipswich, in what is now the county of Essex, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and settled in that part of Ipswich which subsequently became the town of Essex.

The Cogswells were always leaders in the community in which they dwelt. In the fifth generation of the family eight brothers served in the Continental Army in the war of the Revolution, their aggregate term of service being thirty-eight years. One of the brothers, the grandfather of WILLIAM COGSWELL, entered the Army as a private at the age of 15 years, subsequently became surgeon's mate, surgeon, and chief medical officer of the Army, from which position he resigned in 1785.

WILLIAM COGSWELL, seventh in descent from John Cogswell, was born at Bradford, Mass., August 23, 1838, of the marriage of George Cogswell and Abigail Parker. His father, George Cogswell, is a surgeon of extended practice and great reputation, and through a long and busy life has held many important public and private offices. He was one of the founders of the Republican party in Massachusetts, and was a delegate in the convention which nominated Abraham Lincoln in 1860. He is now, at the age of 88, living at his home in Bradford, with mental powers unimpaired by the passage of time, serenely awaiting the summons which in the order of nature can not be many years delayed. Young COGSWELL's mother died when he was about 7 years of age.

He received his early education at Atkinson Academy, Atkinson, N. H., and Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., and at Kimball's Union Academy, Meriden, N. H. One of his instructors at Atkinson writes of him:

He was a bright boy, decided and independent in his opinions, but always pleasant and gentlemanly in their expression, so that he did not offend those with whom he differed.

Gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber can best testify how far in this respect the boy was the father of the man. Entering Dartmouth College in 1855, he remained there only a short time, and in 1856 and 1857 made the voyage around the world as a sailor before the mast. Upon his return he began the study of law at the Harvard Law School, and on September 8, 1860, was admitted to practice as a member of the Essex bar.

But COGSWELL was not destined for a career at the bar. His life came to be so full of great events that no room was left for the wearying diligence and exclusive devotion which alone command success in the legal profession. For a time he remained in the office of William D. Northend, an eminent member of the Essex bar, and in April, 1861, he ventured to open an office for himself at Salem. We can well understand how little, in those exciting days, his mind and heart responded to the dreary exactions of the beginnings of a professional career. He had enlisted as a private in the Second Corps of Cadets, a militia organization of the State, and during the winter of 1860-61 was enthusiastic in the performance of his military duties. Governor Andrew believed war to be inevitable, and had sought to ascertain from the various militia organizations in the State how many men, if called upon for duty, would respond. When the roll of the cadets was called, WILLIAM COGSWELL was one of the first to answer that he was ready when the time should come. Throughout that winter his voice was heard at various public meetings in support of the Constitution, the laws, and the integrity of his country.

I fancy that up to the 19th of April, 1861, few clients had found their way to the young lawyer's office. At about 1 o'clock in the afternoon of that day news came to Salem which changed his whole career. The Sixth Massachusetts had been attacked in the streets of Baltimore on its march to the defense of the capital, which it was destined to reach as the first armed body of volunteers. Law books, clients, and the hope of clients were all thrown aside, and the law office became the recruiting station, where in twenty-four hours a full company was raised for the war. It is worthy of notice that this was the first company in the country which was recruited for the war. This company, with Captain COGSWELL in command, became Company C of the Second Massachusetts Infantry Volunteers, which was under the command of Col. George H. Gordon, a graduate of West Point. On the 25th of May, COGSWELL was mustered into the service of the United States as captain, to serve three years, and on the 12th of July the regiment crossed the Potomac and stepped upon the soil which was to receive so much of its precious blood. By the side of the national flag was borne the emblem of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, but upon its folds were the words, then, always, and forever dear to Massachusetts hearts: "We carry the flag and keep step to the music of the Union."

COGSWELL commanded this regiment longer than any other man. How closely it was connected with his military career we can judge from the words of General Hooker, who, when recommending him for promotion, wrote:

He has commanded the regiment with distinction in and out of battle for more than two years. Colonels make regiments, and his, as is well known to two armies, has no superior.

Mr. Speaker, you will forgive a son of Massachusetts if for one moment, yielding to a just pride, he dwells upon this regiment which in its membership, its achievements, and its sufferings represents so much of all that is dear to that ancient State. Its commander, born on our soil, educated at West Point, a veteran of the Mexican war, was destined to win new laurels and retire with the rank of brevet major-general. Its lieutenant-colonel, educated at West Point, retired with the rank of brevet major-general. Of its officers 25 were graduates of colleges, and many more interrupted their higher education to enter the service, and 24 were killed in battle or died in the hospital of wounds or disease contracted in the line of duty. The valor and devotion of the enlisted men were abundantly manifest upon many fields. At Cedar Mountain the loss was 35 per cent; at Antietam, 35 per cent; at Chancellorsville, 33 per cent of those in action, and at Gettysburg, 44 men out of every 100 who went into the battle were killed or wounded. In the war 843 men were killed, wounded, and disabled in action or by accident or disease. Well may the men of this regiment take to themselves the words that were spoken by the side of the monument of Robert G. Shaw, who entered the service with them as an officer:

Ah, when the fight is won,
Dear Land, whom triflers now make bold to scorn
(Thee! from whose forehead Earth awaits her morn),
How nobler shall the sun
Flame in thy sky, how heavier breathe thy air,
That thou breed children who for thee could dare
And die as thine have done!

Although the limitations of this occasion prohibit a description in detail of COGSWELL's military services, a sketch of them can by no means be omitted. In the latter part of 1861 and the early part of 1862 he was under Banks's command. In March, 1862, when Banks was driven out of the Shenandoah Valley and across the Potomac at Williamsport, the Second Massachusetts was the rear guard which, by its dogged persistence, resisted the approach of the victorious troops of Jackson. At Cedar Mountain and at Antietam the regiment was hotly engaged, and in the latter battle COGSWELL received a slight wound. On September 25, 1862, he was detailed as acting major of the regiment and mustered in as lieutenant-colonel October 23, 1862. On the second day of the battle of Chancellorsville, May 3, 1863, COGSWELL received a severe wound in the left arm, from the effects of which he always suffered. Under his command the regiment fought on this battlefield until it was without ammunition of its own, and then continued the contest with ammunition gathered from the cartridge boxes of the wounded and dead of the retreating enemy, until this ammunition in its turn was exhausted. On June 25, 1863, when 24 years of age, he was mustered in as colonel of the regiment. By reason of the wound which he had received at Chancellorsville he escaped the terrible experience at Gettysburg, where its commanding officer was shot at the head of the regiment.

He returned to the front with his wounded arm still in a sling. After a period of service in New York City during the draft riots, he rejoined the Army of the Potomac, and in September, 1863, he, with his regiment, was attached to the Army of the Cumberland.

On the 31st of December the regiment, whose term of service had expired, reenlisted and became the Second Regiment of Massachusetts Veteran Volunteers. In January, 1864, a furlough of thirty days was given them, and on the 19th of that month the regiment reached Boston, where it was received with the most intense enthusiasm. Of the 1,046 men who had left Boston thirty months before, 222 returned. At the reception given at Faneuil Hall, Colonel COGSWELL, replying to an eloquent address by Governor Andrew, said:

When I say to your excellency that these men, with the experience they have had, with the hardships, sufferings, and dangers that they have seen and dared, have reenlisted, I have said enough for a lifetime in their praise.

On the return to the front, COGSWELL took part in the campaign against Atlanta. After the capture of the city he was made by General Sherman post commandant, and continued in that office until the evacuation by the Union troops, when it became his duty to destroy all buildings and works of military importance in that city.

COGSWELL rarely spoke of his military career, but thirty years later the duty of destruction which he was called upon to perform was recalled to the memory of those who then sat in this Hall. The military commandant had become a Representative of the people of Massachusetts. The people of Georgia were asking from the Treasury of the United States national aid for the expatriation about to be held in the city of Atlanta. Differences had arisen between members of this House and those at the other end of the Capitol. COGSWELL arose in his place and said:

Mr. Speaker, on the morning of the 3d day of September, 1864, as a member of the Federal Army I marched into the city of Atlanta. It had been partially destroyed by the retreating Confederate forces under General Hood. We occupied it until the 17th day of November following. At that time it had a population of but 10,000 inhabitants. During our occupancy of the city we sent north or south the people there residing, and made it a complete military post. On the 18th day of November General Sherman's army withdrew from the region of country surrounding that city, and as the commandant of the post of Atlanta it became my duty to remain the night following with my command. The day and night following, and indeed for nearly the entire three days ending on the morning of the 17th of November, the city was wholly destroyed for any military purposes and occupancy under the sad exigencies and necessities of war, and I left it a heap of smoldering ruins and ashes.

Mr. Speaker, I returned to the city of Atlanta not many years ago, and I found that that city, which was then, when I last saw it, but a mound of ashes and ruins, had arisen from its fires, from its ashes, and from its sad condition, and had grown to be a magnificent city of 100,000 inhabitants, with all of the evidences of prosperity, of enterprise, of push, and of business exhibited by any other city on this continent. I found that from the narrow limits which formerly environed it it had grown out 7 miles, and where we had surrounded the city with earthwork after earthwork it had pushed its settlements, its dwelling houses, its factories, its workshops, and its places of business away beyond the old limits, and had so far obliterated the whole line of earthworks and the evidences of war that I could hardly find one of the fields of the many where we had engaged in battle when we besieged the city.

I came back to see a typical American city, built upon the ruins and the ravages of war, in a contest in which its defenders had been defeated, and I was proud to see it capable so soon of renewing its old American spirit and putting itself in the front, where the noble and enterprising citizens of Atlanta have put that beautiful "gate city" of the South.

Mr. Speaker, when the proposition came before me as a member of the Committee on Appropriations whether in this enterprise, which contains all of the elements of success, we should take a part and have the Government exhibits displayed and help along the great exposition, I said to that people, "If I stand alone there is one voice and one vote that will give Atlanta any reasonable assistance from the General Government." And so all hail to her in her grand and what I believe will be successful exposition.

No man in the Union could have spoken more effectively for Atlanta's cause. No one more fittingly could carry from his comrades in arms and the people of his State their message of peace and good will to the new South than the man who, within its limits, had wrought ruin by fire and sword.

After the destruction of Atlanta, COGSWELL was with Sherman on the march to Savannah, and in the operations about that city was promoted upon the battlefield and assigned to the command of a brigade. His brevet as brigadier-general dated from December 12, 1864, and on January 12, 1865, he was assigned by the President to the command of the Third Brigade of the Third Division, Twentieth Army Corps, and continued in command until June 13, 1865, when the corps was discontinued.

At the battle of Averysboro, in April, 1865, COGSWELL was again wounded, but not so severely as to keep him from duty, for two days later we find him engaged upon a field where, according to the official report, upon the morning after the engagement three distinct rows of the enemy's dead were in the rear of his brigade. Here, too, he received a slight wound from a piece of shell.

At the close of the war, on July 24, 1865, he was mustered out and honorably discharged, after four years and three months of service, and at the age of 26 years returned to the practice of law.

I can not trust myself to speak of these years of splendid service. He who has not "shared the incommunicable experience of war" has neither the capacity nor the right to describe it. I trust I may be pardoned if, failing in my own, I borrow the words of a gallant soldier who in civil life has adorned an illustrious name. Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, speaking on Memorial Day to the students of Harvard College, said:

Most men who know battle know the cynic force with which the thoughts of common sense will assail them in times of stress, but they know that in their greatest moments faith has trampled those thoughts under foot. If you have been in line, suppose on Tremont Street Mall, ordered simply to wait and to do nothing, and have watched the enemy bring their guns to bear upon you down a gentle slope like that from Beacon street, have seen the puff of the firing, have felt the burst of the spherical case shot as it came toward you, have heard and seen the shrieking fragments go tearing through your company, and have known that the next or the next shot carries your fate; if you have advanced in line and have seen ahead of you the spot which you must pass where the rifle bullets are striking; if you have ridden by night at a walk toward the blue line of fire at the dead angle of Spotsylvania, where for twenty-four hours the soldiers were fighting on the two sides of an earthwork, and in the morning the dead and dying lay piled in a row six deep, and as you rode have heard the bullets splashing in the mud and earth about you; if you have been on the picket line at night in a black and unknown wood, have heard the spat of the bullets upon the trees, and as you moved have felt your foot slip upon a dead man's body; if you have had a blind, fierce gallop against the enemy, with your blood up and a pace that left no time for fear; if, in short, as some, I hope many, who hear me have known, you have known the vicissitudes of terror and of triumph in war, you know that there is such a thing as the faith I spoke of. You know your own weakness and are modest, but you know that man has in him that unspeakable something which makes him capable of miracle, able to lift himself by the might of his own soul, unaided, able to face annihilation for a blind belief.

The men of my generation can never hope to understand the truth which these words seek to tell us. They come faintly to us like the sound of a distant bugle call, quickening the pulse with the hope that we might not be found wanting in an hour of trial.

But the generation which is reaping where it has not sown, though it know not the agony of the seedtime, can measure the abundance of the harvest; and as one by one, with ever-increasing frequency, those who by their valor and devotion have united discordant States into a lasting Union, sustained by the willing loyalty of freemen North and South alike, fall from the ranks of the living, upon their graves we reverently lay the tribute of our enduring gratitude.

General COGSWELL was married on June 20, 1865, to Emma Thordike Proctor, who died April 1, 1877. Of this marriage there are now living two children, William and Emma Silsby. He married again on December 12, 1881, Eva M. Davis, who survives him.

The membership of this House for thirty years has demonstrated how often the qualities of leadership, which were developed in the war, have led on to promotion in the walks of civil life. It was thus in the case of COGSWELL. Two years after his retirement from the Army he was elected mayor of the city of Salem and served three years in that office. Again in 1873 and 1874 he was reelected to that position. Five times, in 1870, 1871, 1881, 1882, and 1883 he was elected to membership in the Massachusetts house of representatives. In 1876 he was appointed inspector-general of fish throughout the State of Massachusetts and held that lucrative office for ten years. In 1885 and 1886 he was a member of the State senate of Massachusetts. In all of these positions he rendered faithful and effective service.

In 1886 he was elected from the Essex district of Massachusetts to membership in the Fiftyeth Congress, and later reelected to the Fifty-first, Fifty-second, Fifty-third, and Fifty-fourth Congresses. The principal committees on which he served were those on Appropriations, Rivers and Harbors, and the District of Columbia.

In this presence I refrain from dwelling upon his service in this Chamber. Those who are to follow me can best do that. But this much I know and can say. To every duty which his position imposed upon him he was faithful to the end. No duty was so great that he shrank from it; none so small that he neglected it. He was neither an orator nor a frequent speaker, but he lent to all that he said the weight of sincerity and truth. Massachusetts has had few Representatives who have wielded a greater influence than his. He was respected and loved by his associates. Although he was unswerving in his allegiance to the principles of the Republican party, he never forfeited the confidence and respect of gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber. While he never forgot the cause to which he had devoted the best years of his life upon the battlefield, and jealously guarded every right which he had helped to win, he had no more loving friends than his associates here against whom he had so strenuously fought day after day for more than four years. With him there was no shadow of yielding of any of the great results of the war; but, saving this, with him the war was done when he laid aside his sword in 1865.

He so conducted himself in his great office as a Representative of the people in the Congress of the United States that he grew year after year in the esteem of his constituents, so that in the election of 1894 he was returned to the Fifty-fourth Congress by a plurality of more than 10,000 votes.

But this message of renewed confidence from his people fell upon ears dulled by approaching death. The disease from which COGSWELL had been suffering for many months began in the autumn of 1894 to assume an alarming aspect. He was able to take little part in the political canvass of that year, and it was not until January that he took his seat in the last session of the Fifty-third Congress. But his work was done. A few days of attendance on the sessions of the House served but to convince him and his sorrowing colleagues of the havoc which disease had wrought in the sturdy frame, and he soon sought to recover health and strength under more favoring skies.

In the Island of Jamaica, cheered by the companionship of his loving wife, he seemed at first to gain in vigor. But the hope which the temporary improvement aroused in the breast of the stricken man soon passed away. Returning to our shores, slowly he made his way northward through Georgia and Tennessee and North Carolina and Virginia, all so full of memories for him. The kindness of the people of the South, and especially of those of Atlanta, seemed like a benediction in those final days. He reached Washington, but he could go no farther. Here he lingered until the 22d of May, 1895. Then, surrounded and sustained by the love of children and of the woman who had been companion, friend, and wife alike, he passed into the eternal rest.

When a few days later, in the city of his home, he lay waiting the solemn service for the dead, a great throng of men and women came to his side for the last farewell. They remembered the steadfast friend, the faithful official, the brave soldier, and for him they mourned. They knew that after a lifetime of public service he had died in honorable poverty, and in that they rejoiced.

Mr. Speaker, the life which has been so lived has not been lived in vain, and its lesson will endure from generation to generation, a heritage and an inspiration among his people.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have never known in all my life a man for whom I had greater admiration than I had for General COGSWELL. During his whole service in Congress my acquaintance with him was most intimate.

In the Fiftieth Congress he was assigned to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, of which I was myself a member. The work of that committee is laborious and exacting and calculated to bring to view both the strong and the weak characteristics of its members. It is wholly nonpartisan, and embraces the general subject of river and harbor improvement throughout the country. Delegations of citizens from every section come before it in advocacy of the projects in which they are chiefly concerned, and explain in general and in detail the character and extent of the commercial interests to be subserved by the improvements sought by them. No member gave greater attention to these demands or sought more diligently to sift the good from the bad, and to do what on the whole seemed best and wisest for the general welfare. It mattered not to him from what section these demands came. He was a national man in the broadest sense, and all that he cared to learn was whether or not they were worthy and, if allowed, would contribute to the general advancement and prosperity of the American people. It was a great pleasure to him to listen to the recital of the facts furnished by these delegations, which gave evidence of the marvelous growth of our country and its future possibilities.

I was soon impressed by his usefulness and his pure and patriotic instincts, and we speedily grew to be warm and devoted friends. He was a man of extraordinary natural ability, and his information on all subjects was extensive and accurate.

The work of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, while useful and interesting in the highest degree, is so exacting and confining that its members are largely precluded from general participation in the work of Congress and for that reason from manifesting their capabilities. I met him on the streets of this city one night shortly before the organization of the Fifty-first Congress, which was to be controlled by his party, and asked him what committee assignment he contemplated seeking. He replied that he supposed he would go back on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I said to him that his abilities and character entitled him to a position which would enable him to take a leading part in shaping legislative policies, and that he would do himself great injustice to again bind himself to the exacting labors of that committee, which he could leave without sacrificing any of the local interests of his State. His modesty was so great that I am quite sure he was somewhat startled when I urged him to apply for a place on the great and powerful Committee on Appropriations, but he finally consented to do so. He secured the transfer, and we all know how fully he at once measured up to his increased responsibilities and forged to the front as one of the boldest, most attractive, and most trusted leaders of the House.

No man rejoiced more than myself over the superb manner in which he bore his new honors, or the brilliant success which marked his career from that time until his death. Democrats and Republicans vied with each other in manifesting for him the most profound respect and affectionate regard. I remember when the committees were being framed in the Fifty-second Congress, Speaker CRISP asked me to ascertain what assignments General COGSWELL wished, saying that his abilities and high character entitled him to anything that he wanted.

He was a strong and unswerving partisan, as he had the right to be, but with it all he was so manly, so fair, so honest, so brave, and so strong that he commanded the unqualified admiration of all. But I prefer to remember him as I knew him in the companionship of private life. Scarcely a day passed that he and I did not contrive in some way to get together and abandon ourselves to the pleasures of friendly intercourse. How I enjoyed these occasions I can not describe. His thoughts were so elevated and pure, his manners so gentle and refined, and his information so varied and rich that it was not only profitable, but ennobling to be with him. If he had any faults of character I never discovered them. To me he was always a wise, noble, and virtuous man, a winsome, knightly gentleman, and a delightful companion.

The country never had a more ardent defender nor the people a truer friend or more devoted public servant. Had he lived he would surely have grown in power, and that power would as surely have been used for the public good as he saw and understood it.

When the sad tidings of his death reached me in my distant Southern home, I grieved as sincerely and as truly as though he had been flesh of my flesh and bone of my bone. No recompense can be made to his bereaved family for his untimely loss, but it should be some consolation to them to know that he was universally honored and beloved and that his friends mourn with them sincerely and deeply.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, Gen. WILLIAM COGSWELL's name will always be held in highest honor in this House, in his town, in his Congressional district, in the State of Massachusetts, and in the whole country.

I had known of him for many years, but the first time I met him was upon the assembling of the Fifty-first Congress, in December, 1889.

I never shall forget the meetings of the Massachusetts delegation to take account of our duties to Massachusetts as a delegation. Congressman ROCKWELL presided and General COGSWELL took the lead in discussing the various plans whereby each member could best serve our beloved State. In this he peculiarly revealed himself. Eight of us were new members. There, as everywhere, he knew no political parties when the interests of Massachusetts were at stake. The two Democrats on the delegation were as fully considered as Republicans and secured some of the very best assignments.

His strength of character and skill in making the delegation felt in the House as a solid force for Massachusetts was exceptional. While always a thorough Republican, he knew no party in the House when party politics was not forced upon him.

Like the noble soldier that he was, errors in war or peace, long ago forgiven by him and the country, were buried in oblivion. Indiscretions in bringing old errors and differences of speech and conduct into prominence to revive bitter memories by any member of the House never angered or provoked reply from this noble patriot. His great heart passed them by in noble sorrow that small minds could not let the dead past lie quietly in its grave in the interest of a harmonious and patriotic living present.

His sense of honor and love of justice was keen above that of almost any man I ever knew. He always was exceedingly watchful for the interests and reputation of every one of his colleagues. He would be at any pains to protect any one of them from being misunderstood or to see that credit was bestowed where justly due.

He was in every fiber an honest man. In fact, his high sense of honor, ever prompting him to conscientious discharge of the burdensome duties of the high places assigned him in this House, very perceptibly shortened his life.

There has not been a single man in any of the many Congresses in which he served who was not proud to count General COGSWELL or did not feel that he was among his friends. Where so much depends upon the personal good will of one's colleagues in securing legislation desired, no man in Congress was any more successful than General COGSWELL. His lovable qualities, added to his acknowledged ability, made him peculiarly successful.

His death was to me a very great personal sorrow and official loss. I feel shorn of half my power and influence in his absence from the halls of legislation. His sympathy with his associates, which led him always to put the better rather than the worse construction upon words and conduct, his disinterested advice and assistance, seemed to double the influence of each one of us. Massachusetts sadly misses him from the halls of legislation.

All of us who had the great felicity of being counted among his dear friends mourn him with the sincerest sorrow. The district, the State, as well as the whole country he so faithfully served hold his memory as a rich inheritance for their children.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, so far as words of mine are concerned, I might as well rest this memorial service upon the exceedingly beautiful address which has just been made in our presence by the successor of the distinguished gentleman whose life we honor and whose death we mourn. Seldom have I heard in this House so beautiful a tribute, and seldom have I listened to an address of this character that has brought back to my mind so distinctly the great characteristics of the dead.

I did not know General COGSWELL during the war, although he came in the height of his career to the army of which I was a humble member. He came by transfer of his regiment from the Eastern to the Western army. He came with a Massachusetts regiment and in a corps of the army that had done great service in the battles in Virginia. He came when his training and discipline and fitness for a soldier's life had become thoroughly developed and wonderfully developed, considering the youth of the man. He came with a grand division of the army, which was at once met by the jealousies and criticisms that the Western and Southern armies always had for the Army of the Potomac. But the troops to which he belonged very shortly made and established their position among the men of the Army of the Cumberland, and during the great campaign of Atlanta, as we have termed it, they very successfully competed with the best of the Western troops for that standing which ultimately made them one of the best corps of Sherman's army, a corps that ultimately aided in the capture of Atlanta and marched with Sherman to the sea.

Joining in that great campaign as they did, three great armies of the Union, they were in a condition which demanded competition if they would achieve excellence. They were surrounded by competitors in achievement such as no other troops of the Union Army at any period in the war ever encountered. There came to us of the Army of the Cumberland after the battle of Chickamauga that splendid army tried as by fire, the Army of the Tennessee, than which no better army of soldiers ever marched to the music of the great American Union. Disciplined in campaign, great in maneuver, hardened by exposure, and tried by fire, this subdivision of the Army of the Potomac joined with us and the Army of the Tennessee in the great campaign which immortalized the leaders and placed a halo which has never perished around the names of the great commanders of those three armies.

Something of the standing which General COGSWELL had in that splendid army with which he came to the South I heard of by accident. I did not know him at the time. I was on the staff of a brigade commander, and at the point in the movement which we designated as Buzzards Roost Gap—I do not know what the name was upon the other side—I was sent with an order, or with a communication, to be delivered to General Hooker. I did not know what that communication was, but I rode up to General Hooker, who was at that time in conference with General Sherman, and delivered the paper to him. He opened it and read it, and I heard him say, "If I were to obey that order literally, I would send COGSWELL." And then he said, "I am directed to send the best regimental commander I have." I did not know COGSWELL at the time, but I learned afterwards all about him, and know that that was an historical fact.

I might say in this connection that Hooker did not send him upon the detached service, undertaking to discriminate in his own favor by retaining COGSWELL at the head of his command. His career as a soldier is best tested by the progress of his promotions. He entered the Army at the age of 23, without military experience, and inside of four years he was a brigadier-general by brevet and in command of a brigade of the great Army to which he belonged. In the beginning of our war many men rose to distinction by the mere election to a company or regiment, but the man who started as a captain in a great army and then rose in later years to be a colonel and brigadier-general had something in him outside of the common and average capacity and fitness of the men of that time.

After the war I met General COGSWELL in this House and made his acquaintance when he came as a member of the Fiftieth Congress. I met him in service upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, where he succeeded his predecessor, who had represented the district from which General COGSWELL came in several Congresses. The service of General COGSWELL upon that committee made his true characteristics known to me. It is a committee of the House most fortunate for a broad-minded, statesmanlike member to serve upon. It is a committee happily very free from partisan considerations and brings out of the members a broad and judicious examination and determination of the rights and interests of the whole country. No man on that committee commended himself to me in a higher degree for his wisdom, fairness, and justice with which he studied the wants of the whole country than did General COGSWELL. He criticised with the same acuteness of mind and integrity of judgment the claims from his own district as he did the claims from the most remote districts of the South or West. I think every gentleman upon that committee serving at the time will justify this comment upon his character, and that was one of the fundamental monuments of his mental make-up. He was wise, just, and absolutely impartial. His was a mind that was judicial in character, a mind that was fair and just, a mind that was wonderfully discriminating and powerful when it was applied to anything that came before him. On the floor of this House he was a man of great influence. His distinguished successor has said that he did not often speak, and I doubt not that was one of the elements of his influence. He did not fritter it away by a discussion of every question that came up, and herein was one of the points of his success.

When he spoke he spoke with that fullness of knowledge of a subject which alone makes a man capable and powerful on this floor. He was never detected in making a mistake in a statement of fact. He was never detected in attempting to speak upon a question for the purpose of displaying either his oratorical powers or his knowledge of a subject. He spoke from an earnest purpose to enlighten the House and carry conviction to its members; and no man had greater influence on this floor than did WILLIAM COGSWELL.

He was true and faithful to every duty he owed to man. He was a man of stern faith and confidence in the duty and propriety of great citizenship; and in his upright manhood he was a man of the highest integrity, a man of the strictest adherence to honor, a man whose faithfulness to friendship was only equaled by his faithfulness to duty.

Nothing that has happened in my experience here in Congress was more painful for me to witness than the struggle of General COGSWELL with that fell destroyer that finally conquered when he died. I talked with him on several occasions and he told me that he had been warned that he ought to leave, and I urged him to go. I urged him to go to other climes and other atmospheres and seek health and restoration, but he said he had come from strong stock and felt that he could recover. He did not believe he was going to be stricken down. He did not speak of any unfulfilled ambition, for I never heard him speak of ambition, but then and always he spoke of his duty to the State and the country.

He was not a provincial representative. He never spoke about the section of the country that he came from. It was impossible that a man with such a military record as he, a man who stood where he had stood, a man who fought where he had fought, a man who associated where he had associated, should be a provincialist. It could not be expected that he would be a narrow-minded representative of a single section of the country, and I never heard him put the claims of one section against any other section of the country.

But I was speaking of his struggle against death: It was a fight for life, and when I saw him coming back from the South with death upon him I tried to encourage him. I happened to be in the city on the very day he died. I tried to encourage him in that way which we are all so much in the habit of doing, saying that he had recovered his looks and his strength. He said, "No, no; the battle is over;" and that was all he said. He did not discuss with me anything about his fears or hopes or anything of that sort, but simply said, with a resignation that astonished me, "No; the battle is over."

Mr. Speaker, his example was one worthy of our emulation. The grand State that he had the honor in part to represent on this floor has lost another of her distinguished sons. I honor that great Commonwealth, that produces such eminent gentlemen on all occasions to take the places of her fallen great ones. Webster may fall, Sumner may pass away, and COGSWELL may vanish to the other shore, and yet there comes and will continue to come from Massachusetts, from that old stock of Puritans, ingrafted here and commingled with the blood of other nations, great men to fill the places of those who have fallen, but they can have no greater exhibition of statesmanship and manhood, and no higher mark of emulation, than is found in the life, career, and character of WILLIAM COGSWELL.

Mr. DOKERY. Mr. Speaker, I regret that circumstances prevent me from paying to the life and character of the late Gen. WILLIAM COGSWELL the tribute I would desire to offer. But I can not forbear a single observation with respect to the high character of his public services and the stainless record of his private life.

My acquaintance with General COGSWELL began with the Fiftieth Congress, and I served with him upon the Committee on Appropriations during a period of six years. I knew him intimately as a member of that great committee, but was brought perhaps into even closer relations with him as a member of the special committee appointed to investigate the expenditures and conduct of the World's Columbian Exposition, whose exacting duties required their presence at Chicago for nearly two weeks. Mr. Speaker, I recall in passing the oft-repeated opinion of General COGSWELL that the unanimous finding of this committee contributed very much to the success of that most marvelous exposition of all time.

A very brief time has wrought many changes in the relations of that committee since their report was submitted to Congress in 1892. Of those who composed the committee, Breckinridge of Arkansas, courtly, scholarly, and the very soul of honor, represents the Republic at the Court of St. Petersburg; Compton, genial and capable, is naval officer of customs at the port of Baltimore; HENDERSON, chivalrous, able, and patriotic, is still an honored Representative of the great State of Iowa on this floor; while the sleeping dust of COGSWELL rests in the soil of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, General COGSWELL was an earnest and convincing speaker, but to me rugged integrity, exalted courage, and sound judgment seemed to be his most conspicuous gifts, and they appeared to greatest advantage in the labors of the committee room. And in this arena, too, he was a sage in counsel and an unrelenting foe of every unworthy scheme and questionable proposition. He was indeed an efficient guardian of the people's interests.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will not enter into the details of his long and useful career. I leave to others the privilege of properly presenting the brilliant record of General COGSWELL as a soldier, a legislator, a citizen, and a husband and father. He was brave and manly, bluff, candid, honest, tireless and faithful in the discharge of every duty devolved upon him:

The knight's bones are dust,
And his good sword rust;
His soul is with the saints, I trust.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest pleasures, we will all agree, that we have in this public life springs from the strong, warm friendships that we form among our associates. The saddest experience that we have as members of this body is when one is torn from us whom we have learned to love. General COGSWELL was one of my closest friends, the dearest and the most trusted that I have ever had during my membership of this House; and I share with others who knew him in feeling, deeply feeling, the great loss that has come to us.

What can any of us say to-day about our absent, silent friend?

We can only feebly summarize some of his leading deeds and characteristics—opening, it may be, a page here of his life which reveals the lion, and then another page giving us some of the sunlight of his warm, rich life. Fortunately for him his life was more eloquent than anything that the lips of warmest friend can speak this afternoon.

Did I call him absent friend? No; not absent while one remains on earth who ever felt and truly understood the charm, the intensity, the warmth, the honesty, the tenderness of his great soul, his great life.

So many die and pass away, and the world says "Amen," and the fairest critics of their lives have but little to say in their behalf. Others come and stay with us and touch our lives and fill our souls with tender melodies, and then pass away into the darkness, and questions loom up in our souls which we seem to hurl at the foot of the eternal throne demanding an explanation of this breaking up of our loves. And so it was with General Cogswell.

For months he bravely and patiently lingered in the cruel agonies of sickness, and during that period of uncertainty many of us anxiously hoped that the dreaded message of the wires, which we knew must come, might in some way be averted. When at last the cruel, brief, chilling word "Dead" came to us it was almost rebellion that rose up in our souls, and all our religion, all our philosophies, failed to keep down the bitter plaint that we sent to the Master.

Why should he go while yet so young, so fond of life, so fond of all that sweetest is in life? The power that issued the final edict must have known how many hearts were pierced by the dread shaft when WILLIAM COGSWELL died.

Some men seem made of only one material. We see one man made of granite; another is made in softer mold of some fine clay; and another rises like some lofty pine until heaven's warmest sunlight touches his head.

Some seem to have their existence only in the garden where the fairest flowers are found. Another seems to draw his life material from the great, dark sorrows of humanity. Then another is made of the melodies that come to us from the groves where the muses dwell.

One heart is made only of stern material, while another consists of life's sweetest loves and holiest, tenderest sympathies.

When the life of General COGSWELL comes to be written, it will have to be said that he was a composite man. All the mighty feelings that surge through great hearts have passed through his and left their abiding influence.

When heroes were needed, COGSWELL could easily be found. When the tender sympathies of a woman were needed, his heart was loaded with that sweet necessity of life.

His close companions, those whom he loved, knew him to be great in God's holiest, sweetest, and tenderest gifts, as well as great in the heart that accomplishes the grand achievements of life.

He had a soul fitted to reprove the wicked. He had an arm potential against the oppressor. He had a heart dauntless in the face of danger, ever quick to respond when duty called him to action. The tear of a suffering child, the sigh of an unfortunate woman, and the pitiful look of the debased, all found sympathy in his great soul.

If he had sins—and who has not?—"they leaned to virtue's side."

We have lost in his death one with every sweet element of the dearest relationships of life. The truest orations that will be delivered to the memory of WILLIAM COGSWELL will only be heard by the angels as they are delivered in the aching hearts that loved him best.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, an effort has been made at previous Congresses, of which I have been a member, to abolish these memorial services in honor of our deceased members.

I trust that proposition will never prevail, and that the time-honored custom in which we are now engaged will continue. Surely it is good to suspend our labor for a brief season, when one of our members is called away, and recite his virtues, recount his service to his country, that others may be incited to patriotism and high and noble endeavor. I say it is good, Mr. Speaker, to suspend our busy work here for a brief hour on such an occasion as this and ponder upon the solemn fact that we, too, are mortal; that we have here no continuing city, and that sooner or later our work, too, will be done. And I am sure, in this connection, that it is pleasant to reflect that should we be called hence during our term of office, our fellow-members would gather in this Hall and recall our memory and speak kindly of us.

I think Shakespeare spoke ironically when he said:

The evil that men do lives after them;
The good is oft interred with their bones.

I think it is exactly the other way, and it is well that it should be.

We love to recount the worthy deeds and noble actions and the good there is in the lives of those who have fallen asleep. My acquaintance with Gen. WILLIAM COGSWELL began more than a decade ago, when we were both elected members of the Massachusetts State senate; he from Essex County, I from Norfolk County.

I learned to esteem him there, not only as a faithful servant of the State, jealous of every interest of Massachusetts, but as a man of generous impulses, with noble qualities of soul and mind.

What he was in the State legislature of Massachusetts he was in a much greater and larger degree as a Representative of that ancient Commonwealth for eight years on the floor of the National House of Representatives.

I need not tell any of the older members here who served with him of his untiring industry, of his zeal in the discharge of his public duties upon the important committees to which he was assigned by Speaker Carlisle, Speaker REED, and Speaker CRISP.

I need not tell any of his comrades, soldiers of the Union Army, how he loved them, how he was instant in season and out of season, willing and anxious to do everything to promote their welfare and to extend to them a helping hand and the bounty of the Government, when they needed it, which they helped to save.

He was proud of the Commonwealth which honored him, and the Commonwealth was proud of General WILLIAM COGSWELL, and I do not think I am extravagant when I say in this presence and on this occasion, the brave man wore himself out in her service.

He struggled bravely and manfully with the disease that was gnawing at his vitals. Whenever I met him he seemed cheerful and hopeful, and longed for the day when he could return to duty and the service of the dear old Commonwealth that he loved.

As a specimen of his generosity and magnanimity and the big soul that was within him let me recite an incident. When the appropriation for the World's Fair was under consideration, I was strongly opposed to opening that exposition on the Lord's day.

The General, for reasons known to himself, took the opposite view, and thought that the best way to take care of the thronging thousands who were to attend the exposition—to let such attend on the Lord's day as wished to.

When the matter was under consideration in this House, I was confined to my bed by illness and was unable to deliver a speech which I had prepared. I telegraphed to General COGSWELL to ask permission to print my speech in the Record.

At great personal inconvenience to himself he procured such permission, knowing my views to be entirely and utterly opposed to his own.

On another occasion a sick and wounded soldier came to this city from my district to seek my assistance at the Pension Bureau. He found me absent in consequence of illness. General COGSWELL took the man, a humble man, only a private in the Army, and went with him to the Pension Bureau and procured for him the information which he desired to expedite his claim.

These little incidents, perhaps trifling in themselves, show the large heart that was in this man. As straws tell which way the wind blows, so the little events of life go to make up character.

Did you ever think what the righteous are finally commended for in that awful day when they come to stand before the Judge of all the earth to give an account for the deeds done in the body?

It is not for great deeds—founding an orphan asylum or a scholarship in a college, or endowing a school—great deeds printed in the newspapers and heralded abroad.

Oh, no; what does the Judge say?

I was a hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me.

Then shall the righteous say:

When saw ye we hungry, or thirsty, or naked?

Then shall the Judge say:

Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

General COGSWELL's funeral was one of the most notable and remarkable ever held in Massachusetts. When the funeral escort composed of his fellow-members reached his home, in the old city of Salem, they found the city draped in mourning, and the tolling bells told the grief and sorrow of her citizens over the death of the great man who had fallen.

His funeral was attended by the governor, lieutenant-governor, senators, members of the executive council, members of the legislature, judges of the court, and the highest officers of the Commonwealth.

He died in this capital city, where such a man would wish to die; he died in the capital of the nation, where for eight years he had stood as the Representative from Massachusetts.

Like the ancient gladiator, he died on his shield; he sleeps bravely and well, and the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts will revere and honor his memory until the latest time.

The streets of the city of Salem were thronged by thousands on the occasion of his funeral, not only the inhabitants of that city, but by his constituents from every part of the district he had the honor to represent.

There was general sorrow, mourning, and grief among all classes of people in Massachusetts, for in his death his constituents lost an able Representative, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts lost one of her first citizens, and I have lost a friend.

The following clippings from several of the newspapers of my State give evidence of the sorrow of Massachusetts over the untimely death of Gen. WILLIAM COGSWELL:

[From the Newburyport News.]

General COGSWELL's career as a soldier and as a statesman was an honorable one, and his devotion to the needs of the Sixth district, which he represented so well, will long be remembered. Eulogies will be spoken over his body, but the best compliment that could be paid him was that of his own people, who without regard to party affiliations recognized his worth and without question elected him again and again to his Congressional seat.

[From the Lowell Times.]

Gen. WILLIAM COGSWELL, Congressman from the Sixth Essex district, was a gallant soldier, a genial, kind-hearted man, and an able Representative. His friends and constituents will mourn his death as a personal loss.

[From the Lowell Citizen.]

General COGSWELL was a brave patriot, a gallant soldier, who won his honors on the field of battle and bore them modestly, as all genuine men do. If he was a patriot in the field he was no less a patriot in the halls of legislation, and his honorable record in the National Congress rounded out that quality which in the time of trial gave him distinguished reputation.

[From the Springfield Union.]

Massachusetts suffers serious loss in the death of General COGSWELL. He has been very efficient in public service, and his efficiency was largely due to the kindly personal characteristics which made friends for him even among his political opponents. He seemed good for a score of years yet, but it is probably true of him, as of thousands of men who fought for the Union, that he sacrificed a quarter part of his natural life on his country's altar.

The governor sends a message to the legislature:

THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Governor Greenhalge, in announcing to the legislature the death of General COGSWELL, said:

"WILLIAM COGSWELL, a Representative of the Commonwealth in the Congress of the United States, died this morning in Washington. Congress is not now in session.

"A statesman in the active service of the Commonwealth has died at his post. I deem it fitting that the legislature of Massachusetts should appoint a committee of their honorable body to proceed forthwith to Washington and escort the cortege on the journey back to the former home of your Representative in Massachusetts and do all things suitable and worthy of this solemn occasion."

The legislature of Massachusetts passed the following resolutions on the death of General COGSWELL, on motion of Mr. Jordan, of Salem:

Resolved, That the legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts receive with profound sorrow and regret the sad intelligence, communicated by his excellency the governor, of the death in Washington of the Hon. WILLIAM COGSWELL, Representative in the National Congress from the Sixth Massachusetts district.

Resolved, That in the loss of General COGSWELL, Massachusetts and the nation have lost one worthy of every token of honor and respect; one whose life was literally spent in the service of his country. As a soldier he manifested a loyal and patriotic devotion to country by raising the first volunteer company for the late war, and his able, efficient, and continuous service throughout the entire conflict resulted in a deserved promotion on the field to the rank of brigadier-general. As a statesman he reflected great credit upon city, State, and nation, and was excelled by none in diligent and effective public service, and in faithful and fearless performance of public duty. He possessed unsurpassed sagacity and steadiness of purpose, energy, and wisdom, and a marvelous strength of character. General COGSWELL departed this life having won, to a marked degree, the confidence, admiration, and affection of his constituents, and of all who were privileged to have any relations with him, together with the esteem of his associates in Congress. Having devoted his life to duty, death found him crowned with the highest honors his district could bestow, with a national renown, and possessing the deepest regard of all the people.

Resolved, That in this tribute to Gen. WILLIAM COGSWELL, the Commonwealth honors the memory of an eminent citizen, a brave soldier, and an able statesman.

The Republican Club of Massachusetts, a large and influential body of citizens of the Commonwealth, unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

The Republican Club of Massachusetts, in common with all lovers of State and country, deeply regrets the death of Gen. WILLIAM COGSWELL, and joins in paying to the soldier and statesman the heart-felt tribute which his life and his qualities demand.

No party or sectional lines bound the mourning for the leader, who has fought his last fight. His whole career, from the day when, as a young man, he mustered soldiers in defense of his country, to the day of his death, is one constant lesson in patriotism that will endure and grow with the years to come. Everywhere and always he fought for the truth and against the lie. His political enemies were his personal friends, his personal enemies nowhere to be found.

He was a national figure that brought honor to Massachusetts. In the high councils of the nation his voice was powerful, his advice sought and followed. In the many circles of his life work he will be keenly missed, but especially here in his own State, where all knew him as a statesman, soldier, friend and neighbor, the mourning will be most sincere.

To his wife and family the Republican Club of Massachusetts, through its executive committee, extends its sympathy and mourns with them over his death in the height of his usefulness.

FRANCIS H. APPLETON, President.
FORREST C. MANCHESTER, Secretary.

When General COGSWELL was, with myself, a member of the Massachusetts senate, Stephen N. Gifford, of Duxbury, a venerable old man, who had served the senate for more than a generation as its clerk, died.

He was a venerable man, beloved by everybody, and the senate and house of representatives voted to attend his funeral in a body, and the senate voted to pronounce eulogies upon his memory.

I shall never forget the closing words of General COGSWELL's address, which are, as I remember them, as follows:

Dear Gifford, we shall see you no more; we shall listen to your pleasant greetings no more. Fare you well, Stephen N. Gifford, clerk.

So I say, standing here and now in this great presence, in this Hall where his voice was heard, in his seat near where he sat, Fare thee well, dear General COGSWELL, we shall hear your voice no more; we shall hear your pleasant greeting and feel the grasp of your hand no more; you have crossed the "great divide"; we will little longer wait. Fare you well, General COGSWELL, a long and last and sad farewell.

MR. DRAPER. Mr. Speaker, I can not better contribute to these services in honor of General COGSWELL's memory than by reading to the House the story of his military record, dictated by himself and confided to me for this purpose by Mrs. Cogswell. It bears a touching dedication calculated to bring tears to the eyes of those who knew him:

To my dear wife, as a souvenir, this substantially correct statement of my military career is dedicated for "her tender care and keeping and disposal". On the 19th of April, 1861, the Massachusetts Sixth was fired upon in the streets of Baltimore on its march to the defense of the capital. The news reached Salem, Mass., at 1 o'clock that afternoon. WILLIAM COGSWELL, then a young attorney about six months in practice and 23 years of age, turned his office into a recruiting bureau for a company of volunteers for the war and in twenty-four hours thereafter he had recruited a full company of 100 men.

This was the first company raised in the country for the war. In May following it became Company C of Gordon's famous Second Massachusetts. As captain of that company COGSWELL with his company and regiment left Massachusetts shortly afterwards and joined General Patterson's command at Martinsburg, now in West Virginia. When the Confederate General Johnston escaped from Patterson's front and joined Beauregard at the First Bull Run, Patterson was retired to Harpers Ferry and his command turned over to General Banks.

Here Captain COGSWELL, with his own and three other companies, commanded the outposts of General Banks's command. Later in the season, the command having retired to Darnestown, Md., the regiment marched to the support of our troops at the battle of Balls Bluff. That winter it bivouacked in the field, and the following spring made the advance with Banks up the Shenandoah Valley as far as Harrisonburg, Va., when it fell back to Strasburg, Va., and here commenced the famous campaign in which Jackson drove Banks out of the valley and across the Potomac at Williamsport.

During the early part of this retreat the Second Massachusetts was the rear guard of Banks's column, and Captain COGSWELL's company with another skirmished in retreat from early in the afternoon until midnight, when Banks halted at Winchester. During the skirmish in retreat with these two companies, several charges of cavalry supported by infantry were made, but repulsed in every instance. The stout resistance of these companies was even mentioned in the Life of Stonewall Jackson.

When the Union command halted at midnight at Winchester Captain COGSWELL's company, although it had been skirmishing in retreat since early in the afternoon before, was placed on picket in front of our lines, which position he held against repeated attacks of the enemy, after daylight next morning, until Banks's troops could be thrown together in line, when a stubborn fight took place. But before long, Banks's whole line being nearly surrounded, it cut its way through, and the following night reached the Potomac at Williamsport.

Later that season COGSWELL with his company and regiment, in Banks's command, moved up the valley again, and afterwards crossed into the Valley of Virginia and took part in the battle of Cedar Mountain. Thence came the retreat under General Pope, back finally to the lines in and around Washington; then to the battle of Antietam, where his company and regiment were engaged all day, himself receiving a slight wound.

Previous to this Gordon had been made a brigadier, and after the battle of Antietam the then Colonel Andrews was promoted, and COGSWELL received his promotion to be lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, which he afterwards commanded as lieutenant-colonel and colonel until he was promoted on the field at Savannah to the command of a brigade and assigned to the command of the Third Division of the Twentieth Army Corps, which command he held until after the grand review in Washington and his muster out of service in July, 1865.

After Antietam COGSWELL conducted a night expedition across the river into Virginia, capturing a band of guerrillas under the notorious Captain Burk, who was killed in the encounter. For this COGSWELL received many compliments.

The following spring he took part in Hooker's campaign at Chancellorsville, and at the head of his regiment in that bloody and disastrous battle was severely wounded in the left arm, which took him from the field, and from the effects of which he suffered up to the time of his death.

While he was in hospital his regiment participated in the battle of Gettysburg, where it made a famous record. Soon after Gettysburg, with his arm in a sling and his wound not yet healed, COGSWELL resumed command of his regiment, which remained with the Army of the Potomac until the riots in New York. In that emergency his regiment and 19 others were selected as the best 20 regiments in the Army of the Potomac to go back to New York to quell the riot, protect that city, and subdue the rebel mob which then seemed to have possession of it. This was a duty which required the utmost coolness and caution, and in its execution COGSWELL was situated with his regiment in City Hall Park, now the site of the present post-office building, for the space of two weeks. Comparative quiet having been restored, with his regiment COGSWELL rejoined the Army of the Potomac at the front, where it remained until after the battle of Chickamauga, when his corps, the Twelfth, and the Eleventh Corps, both under Hooker, were transferred to Tennessee and became part of the Army of the Cumberland.

While his division was guarding the line of railroad at the battle of Missionary Ridge it was ordered to the front to take part in the campaign of Atlanta, COGSWELL being actively engaged with his regiment at the battle of Resaca, where he was mentioned for distinguished conduct. At the battle of Peach Tree Creek, in front of Atlanta, COGSWELL was division officer of the day. It was noon, and the Union troops were resting en masse in the shade, taking their dinner, totally unprepared for and not expecting the sudden attack which Hood made upon the Union Army at that time. When it began there was nothing in front of the corps but COGSWELL's line of division pickets, but, putting his reserve immediately upon the line, he was enabled to check the rebel advance long enough to give the Union troops opportunity to deploy in line and prepare to meet the assault which almost immediately followed.

When the Union lines closed in on the immediate defenses of Atlanta, with his regiment COGSWELL was ordered one morning to advance on the picket line and take some rebel earthworks. This was successfully done, despite a hot fire, and the rebel lines were driven back into their interior fortifications.

When Sherman made his famous flank movement on the right COGSWELL's command was retired to the Chattahoochee to defend that line. The flank movement resulting in the evacuation of Atlanta, COGSWELL's command moved up into the city, and there he was made by General Sherman post commandant of Atlanta while the Union troops held the place, from September 3 to November 17, 1864. This command he held with from 12,000 to 13,000 troops under him until after the Union Army had moved South on its march, and there COGSWELL, with his provisional command, joined the main body of Sherman's army.

Continuing on to Savannah, he was engaged in front of the works there some three days, during which he was sent with his regiment to Argyle Island, in the Savannah River, for the purpose of cutting off Hardee's retreat; but that retreat had already begun before this expedition was completed, and Savannah was evacuated.

At this point, as has been stated, Colonel COGSWELL was promoted on the field and given a brigade command. Crossing into South Carolina at the head of his brigade, he took part in the arduous and difficult campaign through South and North Carolina, being detailed frequently with his regiment to meet the ever-repeated attacks of the rebel cavalry, which hovered in front of the advance.

At the battle of Averysboro, in April, 1865, his brigade was actively engaged, losing heavily, and in this engagement COGSWELL was again slightly wounded. Two days subsequent his brigade was detached from its corps and ordered to the Fourteenth Corps, to hold a line from which a Union division had just been driven. This line was not only successfully held, but COGSWELL advanced his forces, meeting and overcoming three successive lines of the enemy. As was said in the words of another, "The next morning three distinct windrows of rebel dead could be seen in rear of COGSWELL's line, which showed that it had broken and driven back three distinct lines of the enemy."

In this engagement General COGSWELL was knocked over by a piece of shell, but was not seriously injured. With his command he marched to Raleigh, where Johnston capitulated to Sherman; thence up through Richmond to the grand review at Washington; and, as stated before, in July, 1865, he was mustered out of the service, having rendered a continuous, active service in the field of four years and three months.

In addition to this story of the General's own composition, I will add just a brief statement from a man who served in the same command—Gen. Benjamin Harrison, ex-President of the United States. He writes to Mrs. Cogswell as follows:

I did esteem him very highly and we had much delightful intercourse. He was a man whose heart was full of loyalty and courage—an unfinching and gallant soldier in action—a hearty and lovable comrade—and a just, kind, clear-headed man. If this brief but most sincere tribute can be made use of in any way to honor his memory you are welcome so to use it, and I am glad that your letter gives me an opportunity to express my appreciation of a noble man.

Most sincerely, yours,

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

It was not my fortune during my military service to have been associated with General COGSWELL. Soon after the war I met him in various military and political channels, and the friendship then formed endured to the end. He was brave, loyal, a devoted friend, and an honorable and outspoken opponent.

At the time of his death he was one of the most distinguished, if not the most distinguished, of the remaining soldiers who served from Massachusetts in the civil war. His career in public life since the war, both at home and here in Congress, was a credit to himself and an honor to his State. His associates here, regardless of party or section, unite in sorrow for his loss and honor to his memory. In the words of Burns,

He was an honest man: if there is another world he lives in bliss;
If there is no other world he made the best of this.

Before taking my seat I will read a brief letter which I have received from my colleague, Mr. McCALL, who would have taken part in these memorial services:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1896.

MY DEAR GENERAL: An imperative engagement out of the city will prevent me, much to my regret, from being present on Saturday at the consideration of the resolution in honor of our former colleague, Gen. WILLIAM COGSWELL. The high degree of popularity among members of the House which General COGSWELL enjoyed was thoroughly deserved. He was able, frank, and genial, diligent in the discharge of his duty, and his death was a loss to the whole country. He had the respect of everybody and the warm affection of his friends, of whom, I am glad to say, I was one.

Sincerely,

S. W. McCALL.

Gen. WILLIAM F. DRAPER,
House of Representatives.

MR. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that the pressure of public business has prevented me from preparing something worthy of this occasion and of our friend who is the subject of these memorial ceremonies, but I am left to speak from the suggestions of the moment. I came to know General COGSWELL in the Fifty-first Congress, in a Congress full of partisanship and feeling, but from the first day I met him I felt that he was a man who could be trusted, and a man worthy of all honor. Our friendship grew with time, and as I look back over an experience of seven years here, the warm friendships which have been made in that time and the noble characters with whom I have been brought in contact, I hesitate not to say that not one of them stands out more prominently in memory than our deceased friend, General COGSWELL.

As I think of the memorable speeches which have been made in this body since I have been a member of it, I recall many that have impressed me with the lawyer's skill and the orator's power, but, sir, I recall no speech in that time that exhibited the great virtue of patriotism more than the one made by General COGSWELL to which allusion has been made. I can never forget the impression made upon me by his speech on the Atlanta Exposition. I was opposed to the bill to aid that exposition; I voted against it; I doubt not that my honored friend who sits before me [Mr.

SAYERS] voted against it; but the broad, catholic spirit of that speech and its genuine patriotism won me for life to the man who uttered it.

Mr. Speaker, there was another quality of General COGSWELL which the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has referred to, and which impressed itself upon everybody who knew him. There was no narrowness in his composition. His political convictions were pronounced and fixed, but he did not "play" politics at the expense of his patriotism. A lie, duplicity in any form, could not live in his nature. He was the personification of frankness, and manhood, with all that the word imports, was his chief characteristic. For of all the qualities with which human nature is endowed I believe that one which General COGSWELL possessed to a higher extent than any other is the most beautiful and the most worthy of emulation. His was indeed a manhood symmetrical in all its elements.

Mr. Speaker, I mourn the death of our friend, for I counted him among my friends; but, as has been well said, his life was not lived in vain. In the great trouble in this country which succeeded the civil war General COGSWELL, as a prominent factor in that strife, did as much, in my humble judgment, as any man who has lived in his day to smother the fires of that strife forever; and surely no higher eulogy could be passed upon any man as a patriot than to say that he did what he could to bring together the distracted elements of our country.

Mr. Speaker, when the history of the great men of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is written, the historian will find many who were eminent for their powers of oratory, or for their legal lore, or distinguished in art and in science; but, believe me, there will be none in the long catalogue of the distinguished men of that great State to whom she can more proudly point as a fit object of the emulation of her children in a sturdy and robust manhood than WILLIAM COGSWELL, our friend gone now forever. And since his blood has moistened the soil of old Virginia in time of war, I have deemed it a mournful pleasure that I, as one of her Representatives on this floor, have been permitted to bear testimony to his splendid character and drop a flower—a tribute of my affection—on his new-made grave.

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of the last Congress the lottery of drawing seats placed me beside General COGSWELL, and he seemed to take pleasure in inducting me to my new position, instructing me about my duties, smoothing the way into pleasant and useful associations, and exercising a general sponsorship which was most helpful and agreeable at the time and led to an intimacy and a gratitude which impels me now to a word of expression. I appreciate how adequately he has already been portrayed and shall only attempt to summarily characterize what to me was most impressive in his personality as I saw him here and what I think was the secret of his wide influence. It was a quality of frank, direct, courageous sincerity which marked all his words and conduct. I do not think he was endowed with those shining traits which inevitably catch public admiration and raise a man above his fellows. He was not preeminently brilliant or profound or farseeing or eloquent, but he brought to every emergency a strong mind guided by a straightforward will, and his judgment was never clouded by the politician's baneful calculation of personal consequences. He chose what seemed to him right, without afterthought, and hence his decision was quick and sound and earned respect and confidence.

In social intercourse he won and kept his friends by no art or sycophancy, but by a free disclosure of his real personality, and you felt here is a true man who does not seek to hide his defects beneath a cloak of reserve, and extended acquaintance extended your reliance on his transparent trustworthiness. He was a warm partisan and not without prejudices, and I think what quickest kindled his antipathy was a professed sanctity, springing not from conviction, but from hypocritical prudence. Of such assumption he was innocent himself and outspoken in his contempt. Indeed, I sometimes thought his aversion led him to the other extreme, and that in his hatred of hypocrisy he almost posed as more lenient to vice than was his nature. Not only did he never "assume a virtue if he had it not," but virtues which were ingrained in his being he never paraded. It was this same quality of unostentatious sincerity which gave impressiveness to his public utterances and influence to his public example. For while a strong he was not a brilliant speaker; he was a clear but not a deep thinker, a good but not a learned lawyer, an industrious but not tireless worker. But from him words, though not eloquent, and thoughts, though not striking, bore with them the weight of his stalwart personality. His shafts were always feathered with honesty and pointed with conviction, and so flew far and penetrated deep.

I think, too, his slender means added to his great popularity. While wealth acquired in public office does not imply corruption, yet the people are quick to ascribe an impregnable honesty to the man who through long service continues poor. And there is a certain propriety in this conclusion. Albert Gallatin, in 1818, wrote to Baring Bros., in reply to their tender of a lucrative position:

I will not accept your obliging offer, because a man who has had the direction of the finances of his country as long as I have should not die rich.

And although that showed a sensitiveness far above the modern standard, and which perhaps can not be logically defended, yet it appeals directly to the popular heart. And I think some of the warm sympathy and attachment to General COGSWELL sprang from the fact that public office never brought to him private luxury. That he should leave at his death an estate less than $500 was accepted as a natural and honorable result of a pure and disinterested public career.

His position here was eminent and distinguished, influential alike from personal popularity and proved desert. Perhaps his associates were unconsciously affected, too, by the knowledge that he had been a brilliant soldier; that his energy and prudence and dauntless courage had made him a general when in appearance yet a boy, though this was never disclosed by any allusion of his own. To those of us who have only known the "canker of a long peace" the reputation of success in war invests its possessors with a glamour to which their perils well entitle them, and which I trust may never be diminished. The fact that at 26 he had fought his way to the head of a brigade gave authority to his opinions. Indeed, there was ever about him a flavor of that blunt directness which we associate with the resolute soldier. And if he had not the poetic, quivering imagination which soars into the highest flights of eloquence he was free from the feverish and variable judgment of the poet; if he lacked the profound and all-embracing grasp of the philosopher he had not his uncertainty and hesitation in action; if he was not gifted with genius he was without its aberrations and eccentricities and mistakes. God gave him a noble heart and strong talents, which he did not hide in a napkin, but so employed them as to be more effectual and fruitful for himself and for his country than endowments far more lavish. His useful career seems but the acting out of his manly nature, and well illustrates the classic admonition—

To thine own self be true, and it must follow as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously; and the House accordingly, as a mark of respect to the memory of General COGSWELL (at 2 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.), adjourned until Monday,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Meanwhile the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2503) for the relief of Addison A. Hosmer, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1832) to define the rights of purchasers under mortgages authorized by an act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2101) to extend the provisions of an act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 606) for the relief of Sarah K. McLean, widow of the late Lieut. Col. Nathaniel H. McLean, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. HAWLEY. By the instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs I report, back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 160) to appoint four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and I beg leave to have it acted upon now. I can explain the reason if desired.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides for the appointment of William B. Franklin, of Connecticut; Thomas J. Henderson, of Illinois; George L. Beal, of Maine, and GEORGE W. STEELE, of Indiana, as members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SEWERAGE WORK AT FORTRESS MONROE.

Mr. HAWLEY. From the Committee on Military Affairs I submit a report to accompany the joint resolution (H. Res. 163) to amend the act approved August 1, 1894, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, etc., heretofore reported by me.

I beg leave to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. It is to complete the sewerage work at Fortress Monroe. It appropriates no money, but diverts a portion of an unexpended appropriation to that purpose. The Chief of Engineers says the work ought to be done now for the health of the post.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will briefly explain the joint resolution. In the act of 1894 it was provided that not to exceed $75,000 might be expended upon a sewerage system badly needed at that place, one-half of it to be contributed by private parties, the owners of the hotels and other buildings. The work was done finally for $45,000. The private parties paid their $22,500 and the United States expended its $22,500, leaving, if I recollect aright, $15,000 of the United States sum of $37,500 free. Five thousand dollars of that amount the Chief of Engineers says must be expended to provide a system for flushing the sewers.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS JOHNSON.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 365) to fix the date of the discharge of Thomas Johnson, to report it without amendment. It is a House bill of less than four lines and can be disposed of in a minute. I ask unanimous consent that it may be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to fix the date of the discharge of Thomas Johnson, Company L, Seventh Kentucky Cavalry, at November 20, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. PUGH. At the request of my colleague [Mr. MORGAN], a member of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, who is unable to be present in the Senate, I present his views, representing the minority, adverse to the bill (S. 2894) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1863; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act and other acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and to provide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned. I ask that the minority report may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THURSTON in the chair). The Senator from Alabama asks that the report presented on behalf of his colleague may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama a question first. Is the minority report the large book he holds in his hand?

Mr. PUGH. No, sir; it is only 36 pages of this book.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is the 36 pages of the minority report itself, without the accompanying papers, that the Senator desires to have printed.

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir; the minority report, making 36 pages.

Mr. CHANDLER. Without the documents?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. Has the majority report been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to make a remark in reference to the inadvertent statement made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] that his colleague [Mr. MORGAN] submitted a report of the minority of the committee. I wish to state that the bill as agreed upon and reported to the Senate by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], is not the unanimous report of the committee. I did not agree and do not now agree with the rest of the committee as to so much of the bill at least as relates to the proposed settlement with the Union Pacific Railway Company, and I have reserved the right to file such minority report as I shall deem best. The report which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] presents represents the views of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], also in the minority.

Mr. PUGH. Alone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to printing the minority report in the RECORD?

Mr. ALLISON. I merely desire to ask if the majority report has been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It has not yet been filed. The Senator's colleague, the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], has not filed his report, and it has not been printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the majority report has not yet been made to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that the two reports should be printed together in the same document in some way. It would seem that the majority report should be printed in the RECORD at the same time that the minority report is.

Mr. PUGH. Has the Senator from Iowa any information as to the time when the majority report will be made?

Mr. ALLISON. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, when I assented to having the minority report printed in the RECORD I had the impression that the majority report had been printed in the RECORD. I recall now that no report has been printed, but only the bill. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] asked that the bill might be printed in the RECORD, and it is all that has been printed. So I do not think the minority report should be printed in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. PUGH. Is the Senator able to say that there will be a majority report?

Mr. BRICE. The Senator from Alabama will allow me for a moment. The chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads is now engaged in revising the report on behalf of the majority of the committee, and it will be formally presented to the Senate within a day or two. I suggest that as soon as the majority report has been prepared the minority report, or both minority reports, in case there shall be two, shall be printed in the same document or at the same time.

Mr. GEAR. I will state at the same time—

Mr. PUGH. I will withhold the minority report on that statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama withdraws the minority report.

Mr. GEAR. I will state for the information of the Senator from Alabama that the majority report is practically made out, and I am waiting for some figures from the Treasury as to when the proposed payment, if Congress shall adopt the bill as reported by the committee, would fall due. I shall be able to present it to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. CANNON. I introduce a joint resolution. I ask that it be read at length and lie on the table; and I give notice that to-morrow I shall submit some observations upon it at the conclusion of the routine morning business.

The joint resolution (S. R. 135) providing for the appointment of a commission to report upon the practicability of establishing near Washington, D. C., a ground map of the United States, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the appointment of a commission of five citizens of the United States is authorized to be made in the following manner: Three members to be selected by the President of the United States, one by the President of the Senate, and one by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and for the following purpose: To examine into and to report to Congress upon the practicability, advisability, and cost of establishing, at or near the city of Washington, a ground map of the United States of America on a scale of 1 square yard of map surface for each square mile of actual area; said ground map to be as nearly as may be our country in miniature, reproducing in earth and other materials, on scale, the boundaries and the topography, all the natural and artificial features of the surface, showing geographical divisions, also mountains, hills, and valleys, forests, lakes, and streams, cities and villages; and that said commission is to serve without compensation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks that the joint resolution lie on the table. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

TESTS OF MATERIALS FOR INDUSTRIAL AND OTHER PURPOSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print and bind in paper covers 500 copies of the report of the commanding officer of the Watertown Arsenal of tests of materials for industrial and other purposes made at said arsenal during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WOLOOTT. I should like to ask if the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] is aware of the purpose to call up the appropriation bill at this time?

Mr. PETTIGREW. He is.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6349) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, line 3, after the word "schools," insert:

And in any case, if such there be, where the provisions of this act shall operate to deprive Indian children of present school facilities, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to provide such temporary school accommodations, including teachers, as may be necessary for the time being, and report to Congress at the opening of the next regular session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 20, page 58, strike out all after the word "Alaska" down to and including the word "schools," in line 3, page 59, and including the amendment just adopted, and insert:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make contracts with present contract schools for the education of Indian pupils during fiscal year 1897, but shall only make such contracts at places where Government schools of adequate capacity can not be provided for such Indian children and to an amount not exceeding 60 per cent of the amount so used for the fiscal year 1895, and it is hereby declared to be the settled policy of the Government to make no appropriation whatever for the education of Indian children in any other than Government schools as soon as it is possible for provision to be made for their education in such schools; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make such provision at the earliest practicable day, not later than July 1, 1899.

Mr. BURROWS. May I inquire what the amendment was which was adopted by the Senate a moment ago?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment which was adopted a few minutes ago will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary again read Mr. PEPPER's amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now before the Senate proposes to strike out the amendment just read, together with the matter between line 20, on page 58 and line 3, on page 59. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]?

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer an amendment, to come in after the amendment of the Senator from Kansas just adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make contracts with present contract schools for the education of Indian pupils during fiscal year 1897, but shall only make such contracts at places where nonsectarian schools can not be provided for such Indian children and to an amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the amount so used for the fiscal year 1895, and it is hereby declared to be the settled policy of the Government to make no appropriation whatever for the education of Indian children in any sectarian school just as soon as it is possible for provision to be made for their education otherwise, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make such provision at the earliest practicable day, not later than July 1, 1898.

Mr. TELLER. I understood that the school question was to go over until the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] returns. He seems to be away. Does he understand that it is to be acted upon?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think perhaps it is best to pass over this item until the Senator from Montana returns. I understand that he will be here this evening at 5 o'clock. In the meantime I should like to have the Senate take up the reserved amendment on page 58.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to passing over the pending amendments? The Chair hears none, and they are passed over for the present. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to take up the amendment on page 56.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri may be ordered printed.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is printed.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is already in print?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in print now.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator from South Dakota if he will not yield to me to offer an amendment on page 50. It is a very short amendment and I think it will be adopted without opposition. It will take but a minute.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That can be done after we dispose of the committee amendments, which is the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from South Dakota call attention to the amendment now to be acted upon?

Mr. PETTIGREW. On page 56, line 4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Appropriations report to insert, after the committee amendment ending with line 3, on page 56, the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the following persons, and not to their assigns, immediately upon the passage of this act, out of the balance remaining of the 35 per cent reserved for payment of legal services rendered and expenses incurred, under contracts entered into by the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians, through their authorized commissioners, in the prosecution of their claim, appropriated for by act of Congress approved August 23, 1894 (23 Statutes at Large, page 451), entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes," namely:

To William S. Peabody, $29,000.

To Charles A. Webb, administrator of estate of C. M. McLoud, $5,050.

To Marcus Erwin, administrator of the estate of Marcus Erwin, deceased, $5,050.

To Theodore H. N. McPherson, $5,050.

To Mary E. Carey, executrix of the estate of James J. Newell, deceased, $3,000.

To John A. Sibbald, $1,000.

To Samuel W. Peel, $5,000.

To Reese H. Voorhees and John Paul Jones, $7,000.88.

To David A. McKnight, $1,000.

To C. M. Carter, $333.

To Belva A. Lockwood, $1,000.

To Joel L. Baugh, $5,000.

To Joel M. Bryan, the remainder of said sum of money after paying the foregoing specific sums, be the same more or less: Provided, That every person receiving the sums herein stated shall receipt in full for all claims upon the aforesaid fund.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations which has been read.

Mr. BATE. I should like very much to have some explanation of the amendment. No one could hear it read on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I am in favor of disagreeing to this amendment. I understand that the question now before the Senate is the whole amendment of the committee, from line 4, on page 56, to and including line 14, on page 57. I am not willing on any evidence that is now before me to vote to give the affirmative approval of Congress to these claims. I can not find out anything about them that is satisfactory to me in the time that I have been able to give to the consideration of the claims. I have been called upon by counsel who are opposed to this amendment and by counsel who are in favor of the amendment, and also by counsel who want something paid, but do not think that the apportionment of the fees is correct.

It seems that there have been presented here at one time and another claims against this Old Settlers' fund amounting to more than 75 per cent of the whole amount which was appropriated by Congress. It appears also that there are in the list of names given here large fees to attorneys who had nothing whatever to do with the original claim, but attorneys who have aided in defending attorneys' claims. They are all to be paid out of this money in some way. If I were to believe half that has been told me on this subject I should think there had been chicanery and corruption almost illimitable in connection with these attorneys' fees.

The result of it all is that we are called upon to approve by our affirmative vote a distribution of the money to these attorneys by name, beginning with William S. Peabody, who shall have $29,000, and coming down to Belva A. Lockwood, who shall have $1,000, and Joel M. Bryan, who has had large fees, I understand, and is to have all the rest.

Mr. President, I do not know that I ought to speak on this subject, because I have not information upon which to speak. It is, however, precisely because of my lack of information that I am unwilling to vote for the payment of these claims. I do not think we should be asked to vote to pay these claims, specified separately and individually as they are in the amendment. It seems to me the responsibility of distributing the amount should be placed upon some one else rather than upon the two Houses of Congress in passing a law. If an adjudication is made, and it is found that A is entitled to so much, that B is entitled to so much, and that C is entitled to so much, and so on, the authority to pay should be a general authority to pay the claims as they have been adjudicated by competent authority, and we should not be asked to take upon ourselves the responsibility of paying individual claims as they stand here upon this record.

Therefore I hope, unless some very clear explanation is made of the paragraph, that it will all be stricken out.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill, in relation to the amendment which is pending, if he has examined the contracts there referred to and is prepared to pass on their validity or certify to this Senate that they are valid contracts? By this amendment we are proposing to adjudicate as a matter of law that these contracts are valid, and we propose to enforce them by taking the money of somebody who is not represented here—the Indians—and delivering it over to certain persons who would like to have it. It is a clear act of adjudication, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has already said. It is a judgment; it is trying the existence of a contract and the performance of it; and I should like to know whether any evidence has ever been had by any of our committees as to the lawfulness of the contracts or the services performed. If this were a proposition to take these many hundred thousand dollars out of the pockets of the white man it would be considered taking money without due process of law. The Indian has the same right as the white man to have his contract determined and to have it ascertained whether he made a contract with these attorneys to pay them these enormous fees.

On its face this claim is not merely fraudulent, but it is, to put it plainly, a palpable steal, clean and unvarnished, from one end to the other. It is a proposition to put the hand in the pocket of somebody who can not appear here, who can not be heard here, and adjudicate $29,000 of the money of the Indians to this man Peabody, whatever he may have done. What did he do? What service has he rendered? Where is there a report showing these facts? Where could there be a report in the jurisdiction of the Senate to give him any money out of the funds of these Indians? If they made the contract, there are courts in this land whereby these parties can enforce it. If they did not make the contract, I am sure we ought not to make one for them to take their money away. It seems to me that no man can read this amendment without having his indignation raised that the American Senate would think for one second of adopting it.

Mr. President, since I came into the Chamber one of our number has sent me an article from the Boston Journal, and suggested that it would be appropriate to this discussion. I will ask to have it read by the Secretary to show what people outside of the Senate are thinking at this time of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

A DISCREDITABLE STEAL.

Under the general deficiency act of August 23, 1894, an appropriation was made of about $300,000 to pay certain claims of the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokees against the Government. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs was directed to "withhold from distribution among said Indians only so much of that part of the said judgment set apart by the Indians for the prosecution of their claims as is necessary for him to pay the expenses, and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of the said prosecution."

The amount set apart by the Indians for the purposes indicated was 35 per cent of whatever might be recovered, which certainly was an ample provision for all proper legal expenses; and the plain intent of the paragraph cited was to empower the Commissioner to save for the Indians such part of this 35 per cent as might not be needed, and pay it over to them with the other 65 per cent.

Within three months after the passage of this bill, however, enough claims from attorneys and agents were filed in the Indian Office to amount to more than twice the sum set apart by the Indians. Other claims have since been presented, some to Congress and some to the Indian Office. In the Indian appropriation bill now before Congress a number of these claims, some of which are undoubtedly spurious, and others highly questionable, have been included as amendments. The effect will be, if these amendments remain in the bill, to distribute among attorneys and agents, some of whom have rendered no services whatever, money which rightfully belongs to the Western Cherokees. Some claimants whose pretensions were examined and dismissed by the Commissioner reappear in the bill, and others whose claims he settled turn up with increased claims.

In plain language, this is nothing but a steal, and a very contemptible steal at that. If these claims are valid, there is no reason why each claim should not be presented in a bill by itself, where it may be scrutinized before settlement. If they are invalid, it is sheer robbery to attach them as amendments to a general appropriation bill, with a view to escaping notice. They should be stricken out and presented separately, if at all.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the Senate has taken up very much time of late in the discussion of the Du Pont case, and members of the Senate upon this side have been very much worried as to the executive of the State of Delaware trenching upon the legislative authority of that State. Here is a case where it is proposed that the Legislature of this United States shall absolutely take away the judicial power in regard to these cases. This is trenching upon the judiciary, I take it, in a much more serious sense than that which we had in the Du Pont case, and I doubt not my friends on the other side will agree with me that this is trenching upon the judiciary as much as that was trenching upon the legislative power.

We also had another discussion, to which I desire to call attention, as to the value of the services of United States attorneys throughout the country. Some of the members of this distinguished body thought that $5,000 was little enough for a United States attorney, and some of our friends over the way, particularly the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], thought that $5,000 was an immense sum, that hardly any attorney in the land would earn so large a salary as $5,000, and he thought it was too much to give to the United States attorneys. The United States attorneys have great duties of the United States to attend to; yet here it is proposed to give not $5,000 a year, but $29,000, to one individual, for what? Not for trying lawsuits, which requires some skill and capacity and learning, but simply for acting as a lobbyist to hang around and annoy Senators and Representatives; and we propose to give him as much as we pay a United States attorney for almost six years, or pay six attorneys for one year, namely, $29,000. Is it any more just or any more right because the money is to be paid out of the Indian fund than if it was to be paid out of our own pockets?

Mr. President, I submit this amendment ought not to pass and that none of us ought to vote for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not know anything about the merits of this proposition, but there is one provision of the amendment which is very singular. It reads:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the following persons, and not to their assignees—

certain large sums of money. That would be dishonorable and fraudulent if these parties had borrowed money or had transferred their claims. In such case they ought not to receive the money, and clearly the assignees ought to receive it. This provision in a statute of the United States is a violation of the contract and a gross fraud, and I hope the Senator having charge of the bill will consent to strike it out. Certainly it is dishonest in every sense of the word.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I see no objection to the amendment which the Senator from Ohio offers; I personally have no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move, in line 5, on page 56, after the word "persons," to strike out "and not to their assignees."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, line 5, after the word "persons," it is proposed to strike out "and not to their assignees"; so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the following persons, immediately upon the passage of this act, etc.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be informed about this matter. I have not had an opportunity to examine it in connection with existing law as to whether these are claims which were in their nature lawfully and properly assignable at the time they were assigned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object to the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOAR. I rise to the amendment moved by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is before the Senate.

Mr. GRAY. Let the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. SHERMAN.

Mr. HOAR. I do not rise to object to the amendment, but to get light upon it before voting. I should like to know whether the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from South Dakota can inform the Senate sufficiently of the character of these claims to show whether they were lawfully assignable. A claim growing out of the ordinary necessities of business and assigned for a good consideration and in the ordinary way, of course, gives an equitable and just claim to the assignee; but if they are mere speculations by men who have sent out circulars and got Indians or other persons to intrust them with the care of their claims and agreed to give them 10 per cent on what they collect, I do not think that class of claims should be entitled to much sympathy or respect, and I think the money had better be paid to the original claimant and let him settle with his assignee as he sees fit. I do not see any justice where claims are not technically assignable by law for the United States undertaking to deal with the validity or the lawfulness of the assignment.

I ask to have section 3477 of the Revised Statutes read, as showing what is regarded as the honest, just, and wise rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3477. All transfers and assignments made of any claim upon the United States, or of any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or of any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless they are freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such a claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof. Such transfers, assignments, and powers of attorney must recite the warrant for payment and must be acknowledged by the person making them, before an officer having authority to take acknowledgments of deeds, and shall be certified by the officer; and it must appear by the certificate that the officer, at the time of the acknowledgment, read and fully explained the transfer, assignment, or warrant of attorney to the person acknowledging the same.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota what is the nature of these claims that makes it proper to take them out of the general rule, and makes it proper for the United States to deal with the assignee directly? I merely ask the question for information.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President—

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from South Dakota will allow me before he replies to the Senator from Massachusetts, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to section 2106 of the Revised Statutes. Section 2103 is a long section, to which there may be further occasion to refer, which provides that no agreement with Indians shall be valid unless made in a certain way. Then comes the next section, 2106, which provides that—

No assignment of any contracts embraced by section 2103, or of any part of one, shall be valid unless the names of the assignees and their residences and occupations be entered in writing upon the contract, and the consent of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to such assignment be also indorsed thereon.

The Senator will see that requiring an assignment to be made in this way impliedly makes valid an assignment so made; but the clause which the Senator from Ohio moves to strike out would invalidate assignments under section 2106 as well as all others.

Mr. HOAR. Were the assignments referred to in this bill made in pursuance of that law?

Mr. CHANDLER. I can not answer that question; but referring to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, I say that the provision prohibiting payment to assignees certainly should not include assignments made in pursuance of section 2106. I ask the Senator whether the assignments should not be recognized which are made under that provision?

Mr. WILSON and Mr. HOAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. I think I am entitled to the floor. I merely yielded to have a section of the Revised Statutes read. I have a few more words to say.

I rose, as I said in the beginning, merely to put a question, neither to oppose nor to defend these claims; but I think, where we have an express prohibition, not only the general prohibition of the assignment of claims against the Treasury, but an express prohibition, which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has now read, of an assignment of this class of claims, that it is not proper for the Senate to authorize their payment to assignees without being informed whether the condition of the statute making the assignment valid has been complied with, or, if it has not been complied with, without being informed whether it is a case which comes within the reason of the law. That I do not know, and I think the Senate should know before acting.

Mr. GRAY. I wished to ask the Senator from Massachusetts before he sat down, and I will ask him now, whether there has been any auditing of these claims anywhere within our reach by which we can make any judgment as to the fairness of the charge or the fact of the services having actually been rendered. Has any accounting officer of the Government, or any other accounting department which would be a sufficient evidence to us to warrant the appropriation of this money out of the Indian funds, been displayed before any committee or before the Senate in any way?

Mr. HOAR. All I know of that subject is what may be gathered from the remarks of the honorable Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN], that there is one claim of $29,000 for the services of a lobbyist. Whether the lobbyist had his claim audited or not by any public authority I do not know.

Let it be understood again that I do not interfere in this question as expressing an opinion or as opposing or favoring this thing. I want somebody to tell us what it is; that is all.

Mr. GRAY. How are we to apply, I would ask the Senator, the quantum meruit to the services of the lobbyist? What standard have we by which we could apply a quantum meruit to the value of the services of a lobbyist unless there had been a judgment of the Court of Claims or the finding of our Committee on Claims? What have we to guide us in appropriating this large sum of money?

Mr. PLATT. I want to interrupt the Senator. I think, if the Senator will permit me one word, this matter would be explained, and I think it will now, if Senators will give an opportunity to the Senators who have the matter in charge or the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to explain it.

Mr. GRAY. It very much needs explanation.

Mr. PLATT. I think it would be very much better to do that than to rest upon the assertion that there are $29,000 payable to a lobbyist here. I venture to say that as to the $29,000 referred to, which is proposed to be appropriated to the person mentioned, that that person has not lobbied a day or an hour about the Senate. There have been pretty wild statements made here this morning, and I suggest that perhaps it would be as well to wait until there has been some explanation made of this matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. What did the Secretary of the Interior say about this $8,000?

Mr. PALMER. I desire to ask the Senator, if he will answer me, if this William S. Peabody performed no service as a lobbyist, did he perform any service whatever?

Mr. PLATT. I do not think I ought to be called upon to make a statement with regard to these claims, but, as I understand this matter, Mr. Peabody was employed directly, legally, and properly by the attorney who had the original contract to press this matter of the Old Settlers' claims before Congress, and that a large part of his claim was disallowed upon the theory that because he took employment at one time in one of the Departments of the Government he thereby forfeited everything which was due or earned after that time—something of that sort. The whole matter will be explained if Senators will give the opportunity.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I should be delighted to hear any explanation from any Senator which would remove the impression from my mind that this is a palpable fraud on its face. It seems that the Committee on Indian Affairs finds that in the contract with the Old Settlers they reserved 35 per cent to pay the expenses of managing their claim against the Government. It appears from the paper that I hold in my hand that a very large sum of money, under the authority of Congress, was paid to the various parties having claims against this fund. It seems now that there is a balance of 35 per cent that remains unexpended, and that is disposed of by this amendment in this way:

To William S. Peabody, $29,000.

From the statement I hold in my hand it appears that Mr. Peabody's claim was submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and was partially allowed and paid.

Mr. GALLINGER. Eight thousand dollars was paid.

Mr. PALMER. Eight thousand dollars was paid. Without going into the discussion of the claim fully, it seems to have been the purpose of the Committee on Indian Affairs to wipe this claim out. Beginning on the eleventh line of page 57, this provision is found:

To Joel M. Bryan, the remainder of said sum of money after paying the foregoing specific sums, be the same more or less.

It seems to me very singular indeed that this Joel M. Bryan, who has received, as I am informed, $52,025.11 on his claim, should have some moral right to rub out and extinguish the balance. If he is entitled to any compensation at all, he is entitled to something specific, but if he is simply to rub out the balance for what is left, it seems to me quite as unjust to Mr. Bryan as it is to the Indians.

From the paper I hold in my hand it is apparent that some of these claims have been submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and have been rejected. The statement is most interesting. I read from the pamphlet I have in my hand:

The contract with said Peabody was made by J. M. Bryan, as commissioner of the "Old Settler Cherokee," to prosecute said claims before the proper committees of Congress, the Departments, or courts of the United States to a final termination and collection of the same for a compensation of 8 per cent on the dollar of the amount collected on said claim.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs rejected the claim not only upon reasons of a legal character, but because there was no evidence that he rendered service which was of any value to his clients.

The legal objection to the allowance of the entire claim was based upon well-established legal principles. The contract was not only contingent, but entire. It required the continued service of Peabody until the money was paid. He voluntarily disqualified himself from rendering that service by his acceptance of an office under the Government, which rendered any performance of service by him in the prosecution of said claim unlawful. This acceptance of an office by Peabody was such an abandonment of the service of his client as destroyed his right to recover upon his contract. This opinion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was in accord with the principles declared by the Supreme Court in Denver vs. Roane. (99 U. S., 355, 361.)

Now, there are $29,000 of this sum, which the committee in the liberality with which they dispose of this residuum of money that belongs to the Indians, which is given to this person. He has had $8,000; and the criticism of the Senator from Utah is well founded, or seems plausible at least, that when $5,000 is thought to be an excessive compensation to United States district attorneys, this party, who abandoned his contract with the Indians and who has received $8,000, is now to have $29,000 more. As to what possible service was rendered these Indians, I am utterly without information.

There are other criticisms upon this claim which, to my mind, stamp it as a transaction in which the rights of the Indians are totally disregarded, for it appears that these mere speculators—people who have rendered pretended service to the Indians—are by this amendment to have the balance, whatever it may be. The following are sums proposed to be paid:

To William S. Peabody, $29,000.
To Charles A. Webb, administrator of the estate of C. M. McLoud, $5,000.
To Marcus Erwin, administrator of the estate of Marcus Erwin, deceased, $5,000.
To Theodore H. N. McPherson, $5,000.
To Mary E. Carey, executrix of the estate of James J. Newell, deceased, $3,000.
To John A. Sibbald, $1,000.
To Samuel W. Peel, $5,000.
To Reese H. Voorhees and John Paul Jones, $7,003.86.

Certainly there is nothing more exact than that determination of the rights of these parties.

To David A. McKnight, $1,000.
To C. M. Carter, $333.
To Belva A. Lockwood, $1,000.
To Joel L. Baugh, $5,000.

Mr. TURPIE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. TURPIE. I did not hear the Senator's remarks in relation to the claims in lines 5 and 6.

Mr. PALMER. I spoke of the claims of Voorhees and Jones.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PALMER. With great satisfaction.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think perhaps it would be better to hear from the Committee on Indian Affairs with relation to this matter before this discussion proceeds further. Senators are laboring under a misapprehension and are floundering in the dark in discussing the amendment now.

Mr. PALMER. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has been invited in the most insinuating and delicate way to afford any information to the Senate he possesses.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say—

Mr. PALMER. I cheerfully yield for an explanation.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say that I am not on the list of the most active talkers in the Senate, and with three or four men on the floor at the same time I found it impossible to get in.

Mr. GRAY (to Mr. PETTIGREW). Go ahead now.

Mr. PALMER. I certainly yield—

Mr. GRAY (to Mr. PALMER). Yield now.

Mr. PALMER. I now yield the floor to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from Washington [Mr. Wilson], of our committee, has been trying to get the floor.

Mr. PALMER. I yield the floor to whoever may represent the Committee on Indian Affairs. He has the opportunity to explain.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I certainly am under obligation to the Senator from Illinois. It is not my intention to take him from the floor or to make any extended explanation in regard to these items in the bill.

In the early portion of the session I introduced a bill for the relief of and payment to Reese H. Voorhees and John Paul Jones of $7,003.86 for services rendered the Old Cherokee Settlers. A similar bill was introduced in another branch and passed and came to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Senator from New Hampshire states that he is against the entire crowd.

It is true a protest has been filed, but I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire and other Senators to the fact that in the protest which is filed against the allowance of these claims, on page 8, the following language is used relative to the claim of Reese H. Voorhees and John Paul Jones:

It is conceded by those in whose behalf this protest is made that the provision contained in the proposed amendment for the payment to Reese H. Voorhees and John Paul Jones the amount of $7,003.86 is just and proper and should be paid, and that it is only a fair and reasonable compensation to these gentlemen for the valuable services rendered.

That is in the protest of the Old Settlers or Western Cherokees, and I read the same here only in justification of myself in introducing into the bill this item. After a very careful and painstaking research in regard to their claims, I found that these gentlemen had given good and valuable services, that they had examined a vast amount of testimony and papers, continued for almost a year and a half, and I felt they were in justice and equity entitled to this amount. There is no protest at any place or at any time by any Old Settlers of the Cherokees to the allowance and payment of the claim to Voorhees and Jones. I only rose to justify my action as to the bill in that respect.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I concur in everything that has been said by the honorable Senator from Washington [Mr. Wilson]. The claims mentioned in lines 5 and 6 are undoubtedly for regular, bona fide, professional services rendered under contract—made first with the chief and next with the council of the tribe. It was authorized originally by the council of the tribe and in a regular written contract which appears in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, by which Messrs. Voorhees and Jones were to have 1 per cent upon the amount of the claim for defending the fund against the claims of other attorneys and agents who had been employed in the case. The services were regularly professional. Though it is not very common, it is not uncommon that attorneys of the first class are employed to defend in claims for attorneys' services. The services here rendered were of that character and were rendered at the instance of and under written contract with the tribe or nation.

Mr. GEORGE. Were they successful?

Mr. TURPIE. They were successful in reducing a great many of the claims against the fund. They were successful in defeating several of them.

As the report of the Secretary of the Interior shows, the amount here charged is very reasonable, because although the actual hearing before the Secretary of the Interior lasted only about three days and the actual debate of the claims occupied but that time, the preparatory labor involved in the inquiry as to who had been originally retained in all the cases, as to what the nature and character of the services of the persons retained had been, of what value they had been to the fund, and of what benefit they had been to the tribe, was very great, and all this was embraced in the services of Messrs. Voorhees and Jones.

I am inclined to think, as the honorable Senator from Washington has stated, and I give it as my opinion as an attorney from my personal knowledge of the service and investigation, that the claim is a very reasonable one.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the amount?

Mr. TURPIE. Seven thousand and three dollars and eighty-six cents. They contracted for 1 per cent. This is less than 1 per cent.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana if the claim of Mr. Jones and Mr. Voorhees has been presented to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. TURPIE. My impression is that it has been presented to both.

Mr. PALMER. Do I understand the Senator to say that it has been so presented?

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir; to both. If the honorable Senator from Illinois will excuse me, I will state that the Secretary and the Commissioner both passed on the claim. They made no question upon its justice, but decided the case just as they did the others—on the question of technicality merely.

Mr. PALMER. It is part of the facts in this case that certain of these persons whose names I have forgotten—I have not before me the book that I had before—presented their claims to the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as the case may be, and their claims were considered, the amount found due them was determined and was paid. Others of them have never presented their claims to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior. They were brought directly to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TURPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. That, I think, is in disregard of the statute. The Secretary of the Interior was directed by former action of Congress to investigate and pay out of the sum that was reserved for the payment of the attorneys and agents of the Indians, and he did pay nearly $200,000, according to my recollection.

Mr. COCKRELL. One hundred and ninety-three thousand nine hundred and thirty-two dollars.

Mr. PALMER. That much was paid.

Mr. TURPIE. Will the honorable Senator from Illinois allow me?

Mr. PALMER. I do not know why this claim was not paid—

Mr. TURPIE. Will the honorable Senator from Illinois allow me? I will state the technical point on which the claim was rejected.

The Secretary of the Interior held that he could only pass upon claims against the original fund for services rendered in behalf of the original fund, and he held a very nice point—perhaps Senators here would not have held the same way—that as the appointment of those gentlemen by the tribe was for services in defending claims of attorneys and agents on account of the original fund it was not embraced within the letter or the spirit of the act of Congress which gave them power to allow claims as a lien on the fund. But he acknowledged by implication the entire justice and fairness of this claim and recommended that the gentlemen go to Congress for relief. It was in compliance with the intimation of the honorable Secretary, as well as of the Commissioner, that the original bills for relief were introduced. One of them has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending before the Senate committee, and another is yet pending in this body. I say it was in compliance with the intimation of the Department that those bills were introduced for separate relief. Of course, if the payment is made under the appropriation bill, those bills will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. At the beginning of the present session of Congress some bills were introduced and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs to pay these various attorneys. The Committee on Indian Affairs appointed a subcommittee to look into the whole matter and provide for the disposition of the money, if anyone were entitled to it.

It appears that this sum of money is a part of the 35 per cent set apart by the Cherokee Indians many years ago out of the whole sum they might recover, which they claimed was due them from the United States. They appointed commissioners to prosecute the claim, and made J. M. Bryan commissioner and also treasurer and attorney. Over twenty years ago he came to Washington to prosecute the claim of $800,000 in the courts. He made a recovery. Of the $800,000 due the Indians 35 per cent was set apart by the Indians, the Old Settlers, to pay attorneys and to pay the expense of following up the matter.

This money is the remainder of that 35 per cent. All the money that is due the Indians has been paid to them. There is not a dollar of this money which can go to the Indians in any event, no matter what disposition is made.

Mr. PLATT. Not without an act of Congress.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota why this money would not go to the Indians if Congress fails to appropriate it?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will tell the Senator from Illinois why. That is just what I was proceeding to do.

The Cherokee council of the Old Settlers set apart 35 per cent of the $800,000 to pay expenses and attorneys' fees. There has been distributed all of this money but $79,000 provided in this bill. In their council, on July 11, 1892, the Old Settlers passed the following resolution:

Whereas for nearly twenty years, during which we have been aided by such services and by the advancement to us of the said sums of money, we have at each and all of our conventions, held after notice thereof duly published in the newspapers of the nation, declared by formal resolution and vote that there should be set apart 35 per cent of the moneys recovered to us upon our claim against the United States, and authorized the payment thereof unto our treasurer and commissioner, J. M. Bryan, wherewith to meet and pay the obligations which we have met aforesaid and to be devoted to that purpose; and

Whereas those who have rendered us the said services and have advanced to us the said sums of money have relied in perfect good faith upon these solemn and many times repeated declarations of such our purpose, and the solemn and repeated authorization of the said Bryan to devote the said 35 per cent of the recovery upon the said claim to fully satisfy and meet our said obligations, and have so aided us on the security of the said promises of our people in council; and

Whereas we have enjoyed the services rendered, used the money, and will, in the event of final success, reap all the advantages looked for and intended from such services and such loans, and it would be dishonest and unjust not to keep our agreement as above set forth: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians in council convened, That we again declare that the said 35 per cent of whatever moneys shall be recovered upon the said claim shall be set apart for the purposes aforesaid, reaffirming all prior resolutions to the same effect.

Mr. PALMER. What is the date of the resolution, may I ask the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PETTIGREW. July 11, 1892.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it not November 25, 1875?

Mr. PETTIGREW. July 11, 1892, reaffirming the contract of 1875.

On July 28, 1893, they passed these resolutions:

Be it resolved by the Old Settlers' council in session regularly convened, That the commissioner and treasurer of the Old Settler Cherokees, Hon. J. M. Bryan, be, and he is hereby, requested and instructed to use all lawful means to have the money due the Old Settler Cherokees under the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States paid to the Old Settler Cherokees now living and to the descendants of the Old Settler Cherokees in equal per capita distribution, and that the pay rolls of 1891 be made the basis of the coming payment.

Be it further resolved, That the sum of 1 per cent of the amount due the Old Settler Cherokees, in accordance with the decision of the United States Supreme Court above cited, be paid to Joel L. Baugh for services rendered and to be rendered upon the Old Settlers' claim, the same to be deducted out of the 35 per cent set apart for the prosecution of the Old Settlers' claim—

This is one of the claims provided for in the amendment, and it does not provide for the whole amount either. That is Baugh's claim. It would amount to $12,000. He has received $1,000, and the amendment gives him $5,000 more—and that the sum of 1 per cent of the whole amount adjudged due the Old Settler Cherokees be paid to E. C. Boudinot for services rendered and to be rendered in securing the favorable termination of the Old Settlers' claim and this appropriation: Provided, That the same shall be deducted from the 35 per cent referred to above; and the said Joel L. Baugh and E. C. Boudinot are hereby authorized to receive and receipt for the sums due them from the Secretary of the Interior as soon as the money shall be appropriated and available, and the commissioner of the Old Settlers are instructed to enter into written contract as above, in accordance with the requirements of law.

Be it further resolved, That the contract entered into July 25, 1893, by and between Old Settlers' commissioner and treasurer, J. M. Bryan, on the one part and John T. Hoard, of Missouri, of the other part, for $10,000, be, and the same is hereby, approved: Provided, That the same shall be taken from the 35 per cent set apart for the prosecution of the Old Settlers' claim.

Be it further resolved, That after the Cherokee Nation shall have been reimbursed for borrowed money and all contracts in force satisfied, the residue of the 35 per cent shall be allowed to Hon. J. M. Bryan, commissioner and treasurer, as an additional consideration for his long and valuable services as commissioner, delegate, and attorney for the Old Settler Cherokees.

The money has been reimbursed that was loaned by the Cherokee Nation, and the remainder of this money, whatever is not distributed to the attorneys named in the amendment under the agreement, goes to their commissioner and attorney, J. M. Bryan.

Be it further resolved, That all previous acts of the Old Settlers' councils not modified by these resolutions be, and the same are hereby, reaffirmed.

Be it further resolved, That our delegate and commissioner, or his successors, are hereby instructed to see that no claims are allowed for attorney fees acting for the Old Settlers in cases where no services have been rendered or where they have failed to strictly comply with the provisions and conditions of their contracts.

There were attorneys who filed claims against this fund far in excess of the 35 per cent—one was for $200,000, I think—after the court had decided and decreed that this money belonged to the Old Settler Cherokees. Thereupon Mr. Bryan employed attorneys to resist the claim of those attorneys, who he insisted had no right to compensation, and some of the items are to compensate attorneys who appeared before the Interior Department to resist the unlawful claims of persons who had no right to compensation. But they were employed by Bryan, and as Bryan receives all that is left of the 35 per cent, it seems to me no one else is interested in the controversy.

This matter was thoroughly investigated by the Committee on Indian Affairs and reported as an amendment to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations thoroughly examined the matter, and believed that this was as fair and just a settlement of the matter as could be reached, and the committee were also given to understand that it was satisfactory to Mr. Bryan, who would receive the balance of the money when the other attorneys are paid. So for my part I can not see where there is any chance for controversy about this question.

The protest which has been put into the hands of every Senator by the representatives of the Cherokee Nation is signed by people who have no interest whatever in the matter. It is not the Old Settlers who come here protesting. I do not know the purpose of the protest unless it is that this money may all be drawn out in lump sum by the representatives of Mr. Bryan.

Mr. FAULKNEE. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether I am correct in saying that the whole controversy in this matter is simply whether or not Mr. Bryan shall receive this fund or whether the claimants whose names are mentioned shall receive it?

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is the way I understand it. Not a dollar of the money will ever go to the Indians. There is no show in the world for them to get a cent of it, and, as I understand it, this provision simply divides it up among the numerous claimants in a satisfactory way, so that Congress hereafter will be rid of the matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator allow me to read what was in the very first, the original, contract? I find it on page 4. It is the first contract, made on the 25th of November, 1875. It reads thus:

Resolved further, That it is deemed expedient and proper that the said Old Settler Cherokees prosecute the said claim before the Government of the United States to a speedy, just, and final settlement; and for that purpose the following-named persons, J. L. McCoy, J. M. Bryan, and William Wilson, be, and they are hereby, constituted a commission, with full powers to represent said Cherokees before the Government, with full and ample authority to do and cause to be done any act and doing necessary and proper to be done in the premises; and with full authority to employ such assistance in the prosecution of said claim as they may deem necessary, and that a sum equal to 35 per cent of the amount of said claim when recovered, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be set apart and subject to the draft and receipt of said commission, and payable to them or their order by the proper authorities of the United States Government, which per cent shall be applied in the payment of said prosecution and all incidental expenses.

Every meeting of the Old Settlers after that described how much they allowed out of the 35 per cent. The 35 per cent, as I understand, was never actually set apart, but only so much as was necessary, and the council determined how much was necessary from time to time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the paper I have just read, which is an authenticated copy of the contract on file in the Interior Department.

Be it further resolved, That after the Cherokee Nation shall have been reimbursed for borrowed money, and all contracts in full satisfied, the residue of the 35 per cent shall be allowed to Hon. J. M. Bryan, commissioner and treasurer, as an additional consideration for his long and valuable services as commissioner, delegate, and attorney for the Old Settler Cherokees.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the date of that resolution?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The 28th of July, 1893. This is a certified copy from the records of the Interior Department.

All we are contending about is the residue. This divides it up so that everybody is satisfied, even Bryan. I see no reason why we should continue the controversy. Bryan's services were worth all he has ever received. He spent over twenty years of his life prosecuting the Old Settlers' claim at his own expense. He spent his entire estate, amounting to over $20,000. He never stopped pursuing the case. It might have been abandoned fifteen years ago if it had not been for him. He is entitled to compensation. The Old Settlers so regard him on account of his services, and therefore gave him the balance of the claim. He says: "I am satisfied with this distribution. I want to satisfy the people I have employed." Those are the people who are designated in the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think if the Senate knows the facts of the case there will not be so much intemperate language used in reference to the amendment as has been used this morning.

Growing out of the treaties of 1835 and subsequent thereto what were known as the Old Settlers in the Indian country—that is, the band that went in under these treaties—made a claim against the Government for moneys that they said ought to have been paid to them at that time. The claim against the Government has been pressed from time to time from very soon after the settlement in the Indian Territory in 1835, 1836, and 1837, and along there.

In 1875, as stated, the Old Settlers, not being a corporation, not being a tribe, not being a nation, but a community of Indians, got together in council, practically, as if they were an independent tribe and authorized the appointment of commissioners, which had already been mentioned, to employ attorneys and assistants to secure from the United States that which justly belonged to them. They pursued the course—

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado whether the Old Settlers of whom he speaks as getting together in a community as a quasi tribe and making this claim made it on their own behalf or on behalf of one of the nations, or is it to the Old Settlers alone that the money is due?

Mr. TELLER. It is due to the people and their descendants who made the immigration at the early day, and it excluded the Indians who came at a subsequent period.

Mr. PLATT. The nation has no claim on the United States.

Mr. TELLER. The Cherokee Nation, as a nation, has nothing more to do with it than you or I.

I was about to state, when interrupted by the Senator from Delaware, that those Indians pursued the same course that every Indian nation has been obliged to pursue and that every individual band has been obliged to pursue in dealing with the United States Government—that is, to hire some attorneys or influential people to speak for them here. There has never been an officer appointed for that purpose; and their claims have never been paid, except it was by the efforts of people whom they have employed. It happened to be my fortune to be Secretary of the Interior when, I think, the first of those contracts, or, if not the first, very nearly the first, came to the Department of the Interior to be approved. I was met with a difficulty. This was not a nation; this was not a tribe; and it was doubtful whether the contract which had been made could be construed to be a contract within the meaning of the statute with reference to contracts made with Indian tribes. I knew nothing about the claim, except I knew that it had been presented here at an early day. Ever since I had been a member of this body I had known the claim to be presented year after year successively by somebody, and particularly by Mr. Bryan, who, when I came in in 1876, was here pressing this matter on Congress.

I determined that I would treat the Old Settlers as an organization which could make a contract. I found later, I believe, that in one or two instances it had been done before. I approved of all the contracts that were made at that time. I do not remember now what they were except two of them that my attention has been directly called to, and those were the case of Mr. Wiltshire, of the State of Arkansas, and of Mr. Peabody, a citizen of the State of Colorado.

In 1881, perhaps, or in the early part of 1883, for the purpose of settling this question and determining what was due them, if anything, Congress authorized the appointment by the Secretary of the Interior of a commissioner and appropriated $5,000 for the expense of the commissioner. I appointed a man who still resides in this city, who was then residing here, by the name of Clements, a lawyer, a gentleman whom I had a personal acquaintance with for ten or fifteen years. I knew him and believed him to be an honest and upright man. I appointed him as the commissioner to settle these claims and report to Congress. He took about a year to make his report. He made two reports. He made one report to the Secretary of the Interior which my recollection is he withdrew before it was approved or disapproved, and made another, and subsequently another. Before him appeared these persons who have been improperly designated as lobbyists. Mr. Wiltshire and Mr. Peabody had special charge of that branch of the case, appearing before the commissioner, in searching the records, in examining the accounts, and stating the accounts. According to my recollection (and it is stated in an affidavit by Mr. Clements to be the fact) the first report made by Mr. Clements had charged the Cherokees with a large sum of money, fifty-odd thousand dollars, more than the Government had expended in their behalf. Mr. Peabody and Mr. Wiltshire protested against that and succeeded in satisfying the commissioner by the documents which they presented to him that there had been an error, and he subsequently withdrew his report and filed an additional one.

When this case came before Congress for an appropriation the then Senator from Kansas, Mr. Ingalls, suggested that inasmuch as this was the work of one commissioner and it amounted to some $800,000, it was a case too important for Congress to act upon without the opinion of the Court of Claims. Then the case went to the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims restated and recast the account, and it came out substantially with Mr. Clements, the commissioner, and then Congress made the appropriation.

During all this time, commencing in 1875, Mr. Bryan was the accredited commissioner here of these Cherokee settlers—his face was familiar to every man, I think, who was here—pressing what he believed and what substantially proved to be a just and valid claim against the Government. He made contracts with people to press this matter before Congress in every way. You may call it lobbying, if you please; it was the only method they had of securing what belonged to them. He made a contract with two gentlemen named in the amendment, or whose administrators are named, for almost always when a claim is allowed that the Government of the United States has anything to do with it is after the claimant is dead; it is generally his grandchildren or great-grandchildren who come in for relief, and not the man who was originally entitled to it. Bryan and McCoy made a contract in 1876, or about that time, with McLoud, Erwin, and McPherson. They were the two contracts I recollect that I found and that had been approved. Two of these gentlemen died, and of course when they died their services ceased. All these contracts were approved by the Secretary, and no contract has been considered that was not made in accordance with the United States statutes and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. When Mr. Erwin and Mr. McLoud died, as I said, of course their services could no longer be availed of; I think they died early in the eighties—in 1882 or 1883, along there. In the meantime Mr. Bryan employed other attorneys, and he employed a number of attorneys who never rendered any service whatever. Some whom he employed never had their contracts approved. It was found when the time had come for the payment of the debt, as stated by the chairman of the committee, that there were enough attorneys' fees, I think, if they had been allowed, to take in perhaps the whole appropriation. Men made claims who had never rendered service, whose contracts had not been approved, or if approved they had not rendered the service. Mr. Bryan felt it was necessary that he should resist that class of claims, which he did properly and rightfully. He employed attorneys, and they are entitled to be paid, and I have no doubt they will be paid, although the Secretary is without power to pay them under the act that we passed. He may pay the other attorneys.

Erwin and McLoud were dead, and when the matter came before the Secretary he made an examination and a partial adjudication, and I think in some respects—and I say it with all respect to the Secretary—a very unfair distribution, and a very erroneous one in some particulars. But the representatives of these two persons did not know that there was such a claim; that is, they did not know that they should present their claims to the Secretary. They did not present their claims, and their claims I believe have never been acted upon by the Department; they are pending there now. Undoubtedly the representatives of those persons are entitled to something; not perhaps the amount specified in the contract, because, death intervening, Erwin and McLoud were not able to carry it out.

Now, I come to the case which is for the largest amount, the payment to the one the Senator from Utah (who, I am sorry to say, knows absolutely nothing about the matter, as I think he is willing to admit) characterizes as a lobbyist. As the Senator from Connecticut said, I think there is no Senator here who can say that he was ever disturbed or interfered with by either Mr. Peabody or Mr. Wiltshire. They carried on their work in the place where it was necessary to carry it on, in searching the Department files and presenting the case before the commissioner, and when the commissioner had made his report the case ought to have been at an end. There ought to have been no further investigation, because we had provided that the commissioner should make an examination. We had selected him ourselves and had empowered him to act, and when Mr. Peabody came here, in all justice and right that money ought to have been paid. We necessitated further employment. He and the others had not gone into it with an idea that it was to be a litigated case before the courts. Nobody had any reason to suppose that it would ever get into a United States court in any shape or manner. These were not people who could bring an action against the Government for a failure to pay them the money that it ought to have paid a generation before. But Congress provided that they should go into court. Then Mr. Bryan made a contract, not calling upon these men, not claiming that they were under any obligation to go into the court, knowing when he employed at least a number of the gentlemen who appeared here and rendered him service that they could not appear in court because they were not attorneys. Then he employed Mr. Garland, who had been Attorney-General in Mr. Cleveland's first Administration, to appear for them in the Court of Claims; and he and his partner, Mr. May, did so appear, for which service they charged $15,000, I say an exceedingly reasonable sum considering the amount and considering the difficulty—the case went to the Supreme Court—and that has been paid to them. The Secretary of the Interior made that payment.

After these services by Mr. Wiltshire and Mr. Peabody had been rendered before the commissioner Mr. Wiltshire died. Mr. Peabody survived and kept his contract alive, renewing it from time to time through the agent, Mr. Bryan, who is to be the beneficiary if Mr. Peabody does not get anything out of this claim more than he has already received.

Mr. PLATT. May I make an inquiry? I think the Senator has not stated it. Was that contract a definite percentage on the amount to be recovered?

Mr. TELLER. It was a definite percentage, 8 per cent of whatever sum should be collected.

Mr. PLATT. The sum allowed here does not amount to 4 or 5 per cent?

Mr. TELLER. Probably not.

Then Mr. Peabody made an assignment to a man by the name of Hayden, in the Indian Territory, of 8 per cent of that sum. It has never been claimed by anyone that Mr. Hayden attempted to do anything for the Indians or that he has ever claimed any part of it. Mr. Peabody has claimed but the 5 per cent; that is to say, I think he put in his bill for the whole amount in the first instance, but in this transaction the committees have considered it simply with reference to the 5 per cent, and that he does not get.

Mr. Bryan was the active agent of these people. The Senator from Utah assumes that Mr. Peabody is not entitled to $29,000 and that he has rendered no service. He inquires what service he has rendered. Not only did Mr. Peabody render service up to the time the case was decided by the commissioner, but the statement made by Mr. Garland is that after the case went to the Court of Claims, where it was practically a recasting and a reconsideration of the whole case, Mr. Peabody rendered valuable service to him in presenting to him the facts that he had presented before, made on another occasion to the commissioner; and without that service, Mr. Wiltshire then being dead, I do not believe the claim would have been made to stand in the Court of Claims, as it did, for whatever may be said of the services of others, Mr. Peabody was the only man in my day, while I was familiar with this subject, who had any longer a personal knowledge of the facts in the case. Without his service I have no hesitation in saying there would have been a different judgment before the commissioner and a different judgment before the Court of Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Peabody was paid $8,000, and we are now asked to pay him $29,000. What I want to get at is, who has determined that this sum of $29,000 is a just sum?

Mr. TELLER. I will get to that if the Senator will wait.

Mr. CHANDLER. But it is right on that point.

Mr. TELLER. I will get around to it if the Senator will allow me to go on.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator does not wish to have the question asked him, I will not ask it.

Mr. TELLER. I am willing to have it asked, but I will answer it in my own time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to say that the appropriate time to answer it is when the Senator is speaking of Mr. Peabody's claim.

Mr. TELLER. I am trying to give a history of this case. I mention Mr. Peabody because he is a citizen of my State, and because he has a just claim, and because I have a thorough knowledge of the transaction, so far at least as he is concerned. He continued to render service up to the time when the case was finally adjudicated in the Court of Claims. When it got out of the Court of Claims and became a mere question of law before the Supreme Court, then, of course, it was left to law attorneys and not to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THURSTON in the chair). The Senator from Colorado will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. PEPPER, providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the special order be temporarily laid aside until we dispose of the Indian appropriation bill, the unfinished business not to lose its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection?

Mr. PEPPER. I will object temporarily until we can come to some conclusion about the further discussion of the bond resolution. I am perfectly willing to withdraw my objection until the Senator from Colorado concludes his present remarks, and then we will see what we can do as to further proceedings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to temporarily laying aside the unfinished business?

Mr. PEPPER. Until the Senator from Colorado concludes his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Until the Senator from Colorado has concluded his remarks. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when the Supreme Court of the United States had settled this question Congress made an appropriation for the payment of the claim. On the 27th of February, 1893, Mr. Bryan, who was still commissioner, who had been in charge on the ground, and who I am willing to say has called on me more than a hundred times in reference to this claim (I have no doubt that old man has traipsed up to my house a great deal more than a hundred times, both while I was Secretary and while I have been a Senator, to see if there was something I could do to further and help it along), wrote to Major Peabody, who had been the chief and active man after the death of Mr. Wiltshire, as follows:

I am expecting to start home in about a week from now. When our Old Settler claim is passed and ready for settlement no doubt I will have trouble in settling with various attorneys with whom I have made contracts and who have not complied with their agreement. And our Old Settlers in their councils have forbidden me from paying one dollar on any contract unless it has been strictly complied with. Now, Major, if all our attorneys had acted as you did in the prosecution of said claim I would have had no trouble, as from the time you were employed to now I never knew of you losing a single day when anything could be done for the claim. But no doubt I will have to summons attorneys who strictly attended to the claim to prove the absence of those who did nothing for the claim.

Thereupon Mr. Peabody filed his affidavit, as is required. If any Senator wants to look at Mr. Peabody's contract I have a copy of it here in the petition which he presented to Congress for relief. He was required, according to the practice, to file an affidavit that his services had been rendered before the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. This he did, and with it he filed the following attachment:

I have carefully read the foregoing affidavit of W. S. Peabody, and I was actually present when a considerable part of the services therein named was rendered. I know that all such services were rendered, and that they were of value to the claimants to the amounts charged by affiant, and all the statements of facts contained in said affidavit I know to be true and correct.

(Signed) J. M. BRYAN,
Agent, Attorney, and Treasurer for the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians.

Witness:
J. L. BAUGH—

Who in the meantime had come in as another commissioner.

Major Peabody has submitted with his claim which he presented to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a statement by Governor Crawford, of Kansas, who was employed by the Cherokee Nation during this time as attorney to look after some other matters, fully sustaining the declaration as to services rendered made by Mr. Clements, the commissioner, and by various other people. Unfortunately, in some way the claimant got into a controversy in the Indian Office. It is not worth while to recount how it occurred or anything about it except to say that the Indian Office determined that he was entitled to nothing. They said later that he had accepted service from the Government. He had been the executive officer of the Geological Bureau for about three years, and they said that in accepting such service from the Geological Bureau he had forfeited his claim to any compensation, although it appeared that at the time he was so employed in the Department he could not have rendered, because of the pendency in the Supreme Court, any special services except the services that ex-Senator Garland declares he did render. They decided on that ground that he could not recover.

If the Senator from New Hampshire were present I could answer the question which he put to me, and which I suppose he will insist I have not answered if he is not here to hear it. When the Commissioner of Indian Affairs declined to allow any compensation whatever, the case went to the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior declared that the reason given for the nonpayment of Major Peabody was not a good one and he had not forfeited this claim, that he was entitled to it; but he allowed him only $8,000. Now, I say that that is not conclusive on Congress. We have a right to say that these parties shall have a fair compensation.

Mr. CHANDLER entered the Chamber.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from New Hampshire is here now. If he wants me to answer the question he asked I will answer it as I have been answering it.

The Secretary of the Interior was authorized by a provision in the appropriation act to settle this question. We supposed that he would take the contracts and allow the claims according to the contracts if the services had been rendered according to the contracts. The Secretary allowed some of the contracts in full. Of some of them he allowed but a small part. Mr. Peabody was entitled under any consideration to over $40,000 on his contract of 5 per cent, leaving out the 3 per cent which he had assigned to a man who had rendered no services whatever, and that is what Mr. Peabody has been claiming. That is what he does not get, but he gets three or four thousand dollars less than he was entitled to under the provision of law.

I will state that there is a large number of bills pending before the committee to pay these claims. I think there is a bill pending for three of the claims and for some that are not allowed. It was morally certain that if each man succeeded in the attempt to get his bill through there would very likely be an appropriation of more money than is still reserved on this account in the Treasury, and there was a sort of agreement by all the claimants among themselves to distribute the money practically as it is distributed in the amendment. Among others who contributed to see that the attorneys' fees were not exorbitant and that men who had made claims for large sums of money against the fund—some of whom, as I said before, had no contracts at all, some of them having contracts and having rendered only partial service under the contracts, then ceased their efforts, and others who had never done anything at all—among others employed to see that no more was paid was Mr. Peel, of Arkansas, a former member of Congress. He has a claim in here for $5,000. Now, we come to the conclusion that these people have rendered service to these Indians. They have rendered it under contracts made by the Indians. Major Peabody's contract has been renewed from time to time by the approval of the commissioner, and the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and when the money was paid into the Treasury of the United States or appropriated Major Peabody's contract was still an existing contract.

The Senator from Utah asks why not go into the courts? Mr. President, if this were a controversy between the Cherokee Nation and these claimants there would be some force in that, but it is simply a controversy between the men who rendered the service, how much they shall have, whether there shall be an equitable distribution and the men who rendered the service shall be paid, or whether some man should get it all.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. If there are not other persons who have claims upon this money which would amount to more than the whole sum to be distributed, is there any reason why Mr. Peabody should not have the amount which the commissioner of the Indians contracted with him for, which is $64,000?

Mr. TELLER. None whatever, because his assignee never rendered any service whatever, and he never contracted to render any.

Mr. PLATT. That would be $40,000, if that is deducted?

Mr. TELLER. It would be $40,000 without it. But Mr. Peabody is not now in the city; he has returned to Colorado, which has been his home, and his representative, his attorney, consented that this amount might be paid him so that others might get a proportionate and what appeared to be a proper amount. Then they do not all get what they ought to have, neither does Mr. Peabody.

Mr. PALMER. Did not Mr. Peabody assign an interest in the claim with the expectation that the assignee would render some service?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly. He assigned 3 per cent, and the assignee was to render service. That was explicitly declared. But he never did render any service. That man has never presented any claim, and I suppose never will, because he would be met with the fact that he had rendered no service. In addition, the Department always required that with the contract there must be proof of service rendered.

Mr. President, I have said all that can be said about this matter, perhaps, or all that is necessary. I have had a very thorough knowledge of it. I want to assure the Senator from Utah that there is no misappropriation of public funds nor is there any steal here. I say to the Senator from Utah that after twenty years in this or in another forum closely connected with this I do not believe I need to make any defense to the Senate to show that I have not engaged in any attempt to steal from anybody.

Mr. BROWN. I wish the Senator from Colorado to understand that I did not intend to make any reflection upon him.

Mr. TELLER. I will say more, Mr. President. I have never presented a claim to the Senate that I did not practically know was an honest claim. These men are as much entitled to their money as the Senator is entitled to his salary, and there is no more impropriety in our paying it out of this fund than there is in the financial clerk paying the Senator his salary. If the Senator had taken a little pains to acquaint himself with the facts he would not have substantially charged two committees of the Senate with attempting to impose upon this Senate and steal from the wards of the Government.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say that I designed no such criticism to the extent which the Senator intimates upon the Committee on Indian Affairs or the Committee on Appropriations; but if we may happen to differ with either one of those committees and express our difference in strong language, I apprehend that we have that right, and that we have a right to do what we please about this amendment without reflecting upon the committee. No reflection is designed or intended upon any member of either of those committees, and least of all upon the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]; but I have the right to my opinion about the effect of the amendment without reflecting upon him.

Mr. TELLER. Of course, Mr. President, I would not for the world interfere with the right of private judgment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question as to this claim?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe I have used no harsh language about this matter, and I am honestly seeking light. I find here the claim approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to dispose of the whole balance of 35 per cent to Joel M. Bryan. So that that would dispose of the whole 35 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think from the contract, which was approved by the Acting Secretary of the Interior July 24, 1894, which was read, I believe, by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], and which winds up by conveying to J. M. Bryan the residue of the 35 per cent, which, I suppose, accounts for the clause on page 57 which disposes of any balance there may be in that way. My trouble is that in these intermediate allowances to various individuals which are being made by law of Congress, Congress gives them that money, and it gives all the balance, 35 per cent, to Joel M. Bryan. I know very well that there are other claims, and that some of the parties mentioned here claim more. For instance, Mr. David A. McKnight, claiming as a representative and partner of E. John Ellis, claims $12,000 instead of $1,000. He is not going to give up his claim for that $11,000; he is going to press it.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that Mr. McKnight does give up his claim and does not expect to get anything more.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am informed very differently by a brief of his which has been put into my hands.

The Senator will get my point. These other parties are not going to remain satisfied with these allowances. They will be coming here and asking for more; and the point I want to get at is, who makes this adjudication? Who has made an adjudication that we can accept as satisfactory that Mr. Peabody is entitled to $29,000 in addition to the $8,000, and that Mrs. Mary E. Carey, executrix of the estate of James J. Newell, is entitled—

Mr. TELLER. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. Please let me ask the question before the Senator answers it.

Somebody adjudicates that Mary E. Carey, executrix of James J. Newell, shall have $3,000, in addition to $10,000 which has already been paid. What is there to protect and justify Congress in paying all these detailed sums to these parties?

Mr. TELLER. As I stated while the Senator was out of the Chamber, perhaps these various claimants got together and substantially agreed upon what they would each take and make no further claim. It was certain that Major Peabody could not get his whole claim; it was certain that the executrix of Newell could not get her whole claim; and Mr. Bryan still thought that he was entitled to something more than the $52,000 he had received. There was a feeling, of course, among all the attorneys that he ought not to have anything until they got their pay in full; but that would not have been fair, for many of the contracts made by Mr. Bryan were made under stress of circumstances, because of the death of some of the people like those I have mentioned. At least four of the attorneys have died pending this controversy. Then the Committee on Indian Affairs took this matter under consideration and subsequently referred it to the Committee on Appropriations, by whom it was also considered. I have no hesitation in saying that, so far as I was concerned, I thought I had some knowledge of the services these people had rendered. I contributed in some degree myself, I think, toward determining what they were rightfully entitled to. Then we inserted a provision that these people should accept the sums named. I can assure the Senator from Kansas that there will never be any demand made upon the Government or upon the Indians by these people for anything more than is provided for in this bill. If there had been money sufficient to pay all these attorneys they would have been paid, I suppose, what they claim. I know of no other reason why they should not be paid, unless it could have been shown that they had not rendered the services they had contracted to render.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business was temporarily laid aside until the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that we proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection?

Mr. PEPPER. I object, Mr. President, for the present.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think, then, I shall be obliged to move to lay aside the unfinished business and proceed with the Indian appropriation bill. I am in favor of the bond resolution, and do not desire to displace it to its prejudice, but it can be delayed until we dispose of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. PEPPER. I think if the Senator will withhold the motion for a minute or two we possibly may come to an agreement by which we can go along with the appropriation bill. I would suggest to the Senators who are opposed to the resolution that we agree, or try to agree, upon a time when a vote may be had. If that can be done, I shall have no objection to passing the resolution over to give Senators time to accommodate themselves to the situation.

Mr. HILL. What is the suggestion, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will please state his suggestion.

Mr. PEPPER. The suggestion is that possibly we may be able to arrive at an agreement when a vote may be taken upon the bond resolution, and if that can be done, then we shall have got one serious difficulty out of the way, and the appropriation bills may be proceeded with until that time. If the Senator from New York thinks that we can agree upon some such suggestion I shall be very glad of it.

Mr. HILL. It is utterly impossible for me to say when the discussion upon the resolution will be completed. Several Senators desire to speak upon it, and it is impossible to agree now as to when a vote shall be taken. We were assured the other day that no one desired to speak upon the other side. If that be so, probably in the near future a vote can be had, but we can not agree upon a time for it now.

Mr. STEWART. Let us fix the time.

Mr. PEPPER. I am quite well satisfied that the friends of the resolution do not care to discuss the measure. I think the minds of Senators on both sides are made up. I suggest, in view of that fact, that we take the vote, say, at 4 o'clock to-morrow upon the resolution and amendments.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I can not agree to that. I desire to say right here that when the tariff and the silver questions were pending, in January, I think it was, I was intending to submit some remarks, but in order to accommodate the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] I consented that an hour might be fixed when debate should cease. During the last hour of that debate new matter sprang up, new suggestions were made, new arguments presented, in which I desired to participate, but I did not see fit to ask for a vote upon them. I have seen that same course pursued theretofore where unanimous consent had been given. When the discussion is over, there will be no effort on my part to delay the debate if the Senate pleases to pass the resolution. After I have finished my remarks, and those who agree with me have finished what they desire to say on the subject, there will be no further proceeding interposed to prevent the Senate doing what it desires in regard to the resolution.

Allow me to say, Mr. President, that the disposition which is manifested to take up a matter of this kind and crowd out appropriation bills is rather new. I have always understood appropriation bills had the right of way. I prefer to have the appropriation bills considered in their order and disposed of, and then the bond resolution can be taken up in its order and kept as the unfinished business. Twice my speech on the resolution has been cut short by the expiration of the morning hour. It was cut short on Friday last by a side discussion between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRAY] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLISON]. Whenever the resolution is taken up I want to continue it to the end. That is the best way to do it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from New York allow me a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly; but I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that he has a right to move to take up the Indian appropriation bill if he desires to do so.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I simply desire to ask the Senator from New York a question. He says he has been cut off in debate. Can the Senator not name the number of hours he wants to talk, and then agree that we shall vote immediately thereafter? That will make it impossible to cut off his speech.

Mr. HILL. I do not wish to limit the time of other Senators who wish to speak upon the question.

Mr. PALMER. I have no disposition to interfere with any proposition made by the Senator from Kansas or the Senator from New York; but I wish to state that it will not be possible to take the vote on the resolution at 4 o'clock to-morrow. Others desire to be heard on the resolution, and for myself I protest, and shall continue to protest against fixing that hour to-morrow for taking the vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I inquire of the Chair what is the status at present of the resolution of the Senator from Kansas? I see it is the unfinished business. I have been told, although I am not cognizant of the fact, that it has been made the subject of a unanimous-consent agreement. Is that true?

Mr. STEWART. That is true.

Mr. HARRIS. What is that agreement? Let the Secretary read it. If there be a unanimous agreement I should be glad to know exactly what it is; and if there be such agreement, I hope the Senate will not now or at any other time violate any of the terms of the agreement.

Mr. PEPPER. That is the situation exactly, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HILL. Allow me to say right there that the last time the unanimous agreement was discussed—it has been discussed on several occasions—it was expressly stated in the discussion had between the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Iowa that it should not interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the agreement, if there be one, will speak for itself. If there be a unanimous-consent agreement it is of record, and I shall be glad to know what it is.

Mr. PEPPER. It has been read several times.

Mr. HILL. The unanimous-consent agreement was simply made ten days ago, which was to take up the resolution for consideration. That does not at all prevent the Senate at any time afterwards from proceeding to take up something else. There never has been any unanimous consent that the resolution should be proceeded with and not be discontinued until a vote should be taken.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President—

Mr. PEPPER. We all understand that very well. The object of this effort on my part—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator will bear with me a moment longer?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. PEPPER. My object is to effect an agreement, if possible, as to when we may dispose of the bond resolution. Then I shall get out of the way and not annoy Senators any more with respect to the appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senate and the Senator from Kansas. I understand that the bond resolution is here not by vote of the Senate, but by the unanimous consent of the Senate. I understood at the time that consent was given that it was not to displace appropriation bills when they were ready, but I agree that the phraseology used by the Senator from Kansas would perhaps not imply thoroughly that he was willing, or that consent was given, to allow the resolution to be laid aside temporarily for the consideration of appropriation bills; but I now appeal to him to yield to what has been the uniform custom of the Senate within my recollection, namely, to lay aside temporarily, by unanimous consent, the pending business when appropriation bills are ready for consideration. The Senator now has his resolution as the unfinished business of the Senate, and no other business except appropriation bills can intervene to prevent its consideration. After the appropriation bills are considered and amended by the Senate they must undergo, as Senators know very well, further consideration by the House of Representatives and by conference committees.

There will be ample time, no matter when we shall agree to adjourn, outside of the appropriation bills to consider the necessary business of the Senate, and I can see no reason why the Senator from Kansas should ask that the bond resolution be considered to the exclusion of appropriation bills, when he has the absolute right of way to the exclusion of everything else, even if the unanimous consent now asked for by the Senator from South Dakota shall be granted. So I hope, at least for the present, and until we get our docket clear of some of the appropriation bills and get them into conference, the Senator from Kansas will allow his resolution to be informally laid aside, not losing its place upon the Calendar.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask the Senator, as one of the senior Senators on this floor, speaking, as he always does, sincerely, is he of the opinion that if the Senator from Kansas shall now give way without protest to the consideration of appropriation bills that it will still result that a vote will be had upon the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, and that that resolution will stand before the Senate for final action—for I take it that is all any of us want—and that we shall be certain not to be drifted to one side and pushed out of the way?

Mr. ALLISON. I can say without hesitation to the Senator from Colorado that the resolution of the Senator from Kansas must be the unfinished business until laid aside by a majority vote of the Senate for the consideration of other business. I hope that we shall not be put to the hazard of a contest, and I trust the Senator from Kansas will not enter into a contest whereby the resolution shall go on indefinitely in debate, as we see around us evidence that it is likely to do, to the exclusion of appropriation bills. The Senator has now absolute control of the Senate as respects his resolution, appropriations bills only intervening, and I can not see why we should depart from a custom which has prevailed in the Senate certainly for twenty-three years, that appropriation bills shall take precedence of everything else; in fact, according to our rules they are entitled to such precedence. Of course, by securing unanimous consent, and the Senator has secured it, impliedly he may have a claim upon the Senate, but surely it can not last a great while to the exclusion of appropriation bills; and I think it would be wiser and better for us all that we should go on with the business in the ordinary way.

I wish to assure the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], who takes a deep interest in the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, that this is no proposition to set aside the consideration of the resolution or to postpone a vote upon it. I will stay with the Senators to secure a vote upon it as long as they want me to stay here; but I do not wish that the resolution shall take precedence of appropriation bills, which are pressing upon us, and occupy the whole of this week.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

Mr. PEPPER. After that statement of the Senator from Iowa, clearly made—

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a remark. Am I recognized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. It is very evident that there is a determined opposition to the bond resolution and that there is an effort to prevent a vote upon it. I regard that resolution as more important than the present consideration of any appropriation bills; I regard it as of the highest importance to the honor of this nation that a resolution giving an expression of our views should be passed after all that has been said in the public press and after all has occurred which we know has occurred. I think it the duty of the Senate to pass the pending resolution or some resolution of similar character. It appears all the while that there is a disposition, and it is manifest and has become obvious to all, to set the resolution aside, so that it shall not be considered. We know very well if the resolution has only the right of way subject to appropriation bills that a discussion of it between the consideration of appropriation bills can be carried on indefinitely, and the resolution can thus be conveniently set aside to the end of the session. I believe we should get along with the business much more rapidly by taking up the resolution now and finishing it; but when appropriation bills are coming here every few hours and are to take the place of anything else which is pending, it will be very easy to consume those few hours. The only way to pass a resolution of this kind is to take it up and hold on to it until it is disposed of. If it is to be set aside in this way it can not be passed between appropriation bills, because that will give its opponents a breathing spell and give them an opportunity to load up again, so that they can continue to occupy the intervals of time between appropriation bills until the end of the session, and we shall have no disposition of the subject. If it is the intention that we shall have no consideration of the resolution, I want the question put to a vote of the Senate and see how many are willing to have that done.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator must have misunderstood the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON], who always speaks with the utmost good faith. He said, as a matter of fact, that he did not introduce his suggestion so as to avoid a vote on the resolution. I must say, for my part, that I consider the bond resolution the most important matter before the Senate, and yet I believe, as a friend of the measure, we should gain more in the way of friendship and in the way of getting the resolution acted upon by letting the appropriation bills go through and assisting in the completion of them than we should by antagonizing each measure until the bond resolution should be voted on. If the appropriation bills can then be got through, the Senator from Nevada must see that all the moral support of the Committee on Appropriations, to which we have cheerfully yielded, must come to our aid in assisting us in securing the final consideration of the bond resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. Besides that, the bond resolution has the exclusive right of way except for appropriation bills.

Mr. STEWART. All I have to say further is that the time is going to come when we shall have to stand by the bond resolution day after day. It is not going to be child's play.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand.

Mr. STEWART. The Administration is opposed to it, and we must stay here by it. Now, when the time comes will the Senator from Iowa stand by us?

Mr. ALLISON. I will be in the neighborhood, I will say to my friend. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. All right. With that understanding, I have no objection to the resolution being laid aside informally.

Mr. HILL. I trust the Senate is not to be bound by the agreement made between the two distinguished Senators a moment ago.

Mr. STEWART. No; we are simply bound by your capacity to talk. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada his authority for stating that the Administration is opposing the passage of the resolution?

Mr. STEWART. What authority?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; what authority?

Mr. STEWART. Must I give authority for what I say on this floor? If so, I will say it is on the best authority in the world. I do not want to give any other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. PEPPER. With the statement which has been made so clearly and courteously by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON], I am willing that shall be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. The resolution is temporarily laid aside, is it not? There is no other understanding or agreement on the part of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the proposition. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. To that I do not make any objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think I included in my request that the bond resolution before the Senate should not lose its place, but should be the unfinished business.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is the effect of the agreement.

Mr. CULLOM. That is all right.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I was not entirely satisfied with the explanation made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] as to the way in which these various amounts have been reached. I was not surprised that the Senator took exception to some remarks that had been made by Senators in reference to the claims. I think one Senator said the claims were a fraud. I think both Senators, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN], used very strong language in reference to the claims. Although they did not intend to make any imputation upon the committee, I am conscious that such remarks might well be understood as making a reflection upon the committee, and I am glad the Senator from Utah, and the Senator from Illinois as well, disclaimed any such purpose. They had a right to stigmatize the claim, I suppose, by as strong language as they chose to use. They were not justified in imputing any disposition to the committee to press a fraudulent claim, and I do not understand that they intended to make any such imputation. I certainly do not. I am bound to believe that the committee acted with the best of motives and that they believe these sums should be paid out to the individuals named.

Still, Mr. President, I am not satisfied with the situation which will be presented after the claims are paid as they are here listed in the amendment, and I shall expect the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] or the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] or the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] to explain to me upon what basis we are to place our action in this adjudication. Here is a large amount of money to be paid out. It is to be paid out to particular individuals. This clause is not for the payment of the whole balance of 35 per cent to Joel M. Bryan. It withholds it from Joel M. Bryan, to whom it was contracted to be paid, and gives it to these individuals. It proposes to give to William S. Peabody $39,000. He has already had $8,000. It gives to McCloud and Erwin and McPherson over $15,000, claims that were rejected by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I desire to state for the information of the Senator from New Hampshire that those claims are now pending. They have never been considered and passed upon by the Secretary of the Interior.

The Secretary of the Interior gave as the reason for refusing to pass upon the claims the fact that the Senator from Colorado at the last session of Congress introduced a resolution forbidding the payment of any more money on those claims. Therefore he could not consider it. I introduced a resolution during the present session of the Senate asking a modification of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Colorado, and that resolution was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The committee, in response to my resolution, after considering all the evidence which had been filed before the Secretary of the Interior, decided to allow the claims of McLoud and Erwin in the amount of $5,000 each. In order that the Senator from New Hampshire may be fully advised as to the nature of those claims and the evidence on which they are based, I beg leave to ask that a statement furnished me may be read by the Secretary and inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

1. In 1876 Bryan and McCoy, Old Settler commissioners, made a contract with C. M. McLoud to prosecute said claim. The contract called for 10 per cent of the amount that should be recovered. This was the first contract made by the Old Settler commissioners after their appointment by their council of 1875.

2. McLoud assigned a one-half interest in said contract to Marcus Erwin, of —

3. Marcus Erwin assigned one-half of his interest in said contract to Theodore H. N. McPherson on June 29, 1876.

4. These three attorneys worked on the claim during the sessions of Congress from the date of their employment to the following dates: To 1881, as to Erwin, when he died; to 1884, or thereabouts, as to McLoud, his health breaking down about that time, and failing completely in 1886, when he retired from practice, and died in 1892. Mr. McPherson did not continue in the case after McLoud died or discontinued his efforts in the prosecution.

5. The McLoud contract, calling for 10 per cent, would have entitled these claimants to put in claims for $90,168.63, which is 10 per cent of the amount of the claim as allowed, viz: $901,686.31; but inasmuch as they did not remain in the case to the end, their claims were only made for half of the contract fee.

As to contract and service rendered thereunder the proof filed in the Department of the Interior in support of the claims shows the following, the same being the substance of the several affidavits:

Exhibit 1.—Affidavit of James Taylor, of Cherokee, N. C., setting forth the making of the contract with McLoud, its stipulations as to service, compensation, etc., with all of which he was familiar; that service was rendered in drafting bills for referring the claim to the Court of Claims, the introduction of said bills in Congress by Congressman Vance at McLoud's request; that McLoud, Erwin, and McPherson worked diligently before the committees to get the bills reported from session to session; the preparation and urging, with Newell, of the amendment to the sundry civil bill in 1882, for referring the case, with other Cherokee matters, to the Secretary of the Interior for investigation and report; that said services extended over a period of six years, during which time McLoud and Erwin spent many months in Washington, and expended large sums of money in the prosecution of said claim; that he, Taylor, during the year 1886, had a conversation in Washington with Joel M. Bryan, Old Settler commissioner, when the said Bryan remarked that all of the different contracts with attorneys had been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, except the contract of McLoud and Erwin, and he thought it strange that the claims under said contract had not been submitted, as they had rendered valuable services in the prosecution of the claim of the Old Settlers.

Exhibit 2.—Affidavit of W. W. Rollins, of Asheville, N. C.: Was in Washington a great deal of time from 1870 to 1880; in 1876 McLoud and himself took meals at same house with Old Settler Commissioners Bryan, McCoy, and David Tucker, their interpreter; a contract was made in April or May, 1876, by said commissioners with McLoud, employing him as the attorney to prosecute the claim of the Old Settlers; said contract was executed in the room of Maj. Marcus Erwin, and in the presence of David Tucker, James Taylor, and himself; that he signed the same as a witness; that the contract stipulated to pay McLoud 10 per cent of the amount that might be awarded on the claim; McLoud intrusted said contract to Major Erwin for safe keeping, and at the same time assigned to him a one-half interest therein; that McLoud and Erwin soon thereafter prepared a bill and secured its introduction in Congress by Hon. R. B. Vance, of North Carolina; the bill was introduced on June 8, 1876, and was referred to the Indian Committee, before which both McLoud and Erwin appeared and presented the facts in the case; they also appeared before the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to whom the bill was referred, and urged report thereon, which was not made because it was then so near the close of the session; that McLoud and Erwin spent many, many months in Washington at work on the claim, fully enlisted the interest therein of both Senator Vance and Congressman Vance in urging some plan of settlement of the claim; that both Senator and Congressman Vance introduced bills, at the request of said McLoud and Erwin, in behalf of the claim; that Major Erwin, finding it necessary to be absent from Washington part of the time, assigned a half of his interest in said contract to T. H. N. McPherson, attorney at law, of Washington, D. C., in order that the claims might receive constantly the close attention required; McLoud and Erwin remained in Washington many months at a time for several years prosecuting said Old Settlers' claim, spending large sums of their own money in keeping in Washington McCoy and Tucker, whose presence was necessary in furnishing information to committees of Congress, the Departments, etc.; and that said McLoud and Erwin did more to advance the Old Settlers' claim than any two attorneys ever employed in its prosecution, and details how he came to be familiar with the facts, from being present with them, etc.

Exhibit 3.—Affidavit of Hon. R. B. Vance: Was member of Congress for twelve years successively from 1872 to 1884; while such member the Old Settlers' claim was frequently discussed; had many conversations with McLoud and Erwin about said claim; at many of these conversations Joel M. Bryan, Old Settlers' commissioner, was present; that on June 5, 1876, McLoud brought to him a bill that he had drafted for sending the Old Settlers' claim to the Court of Claims; that he introduced the bill (attaching a copy of it to his affidavit, viz: No. 3641); that the bill was in McLoud's handwriting; that at several sessions of Congress, up to the Forty-seventh Congress, he introduced, at the request of McLoud, bills for the adjustment of the Old Settlers' claim; also did the same at the request of Erwin; that on December 16, 1881, he introduced House bill No. 1203 (attaches copy to his affidavit); this bill is similar to 3641, with additional provisions; that McLoud and Erwin were often in Washington engaged in prosecuting said claim, and thinks that the bill introduced by him June 5, 1876, was the first measure introduced for sending said claim to the Court of Claims; that McLoud exerted great influence in inducing Congress to recognize the said Old Settlers' claims, and to finally adjust them, and thinks that they should be well paid for their services.

Exhibit 4.—An affidavit of six prominent citizens of Asheville, N. C., as to the character and standing of Hon. R. B. Vance. (A summary of the contents of this paper is not considered necessary.)

Exhibit 5.—Affidavit of T. H. N. McPherson: That he has been an attorney practicing in the city of Washington for the past twenty-five years; that Erwin assigned to him one-half of his half interest in the McLoud contract; sets out in full a copy of said assignment, dated June 29, 1876; that Erwin was compelled to return to North Carolina from time to time, and arranged with him to look after the claim, so that at all times it would receive attention; that the case had no standing in the Court of Claims, and McLoud, Erwin, and himself rendered services in consulting with members, collecting data and information concerning the claim, drafting bills, getting them introduced in Congress, appearing before committees, Departments, etc., all for the purpose of inducing Congress to send the claim to the Court of Claims; that the services of himself, McLoud, and Erwin extended over a period of five years, and of himself and McLoud over a period of six years; that all three of them spent large sums of their own money in the prosecution of said Old Settlers' claim; that owing to serious ill health at time of making the affidavit he is unable to specify more in detail the acts of service rendered by himself, McLoud, and Erwin.

Exhibit 6.—Affidavit of Ella C. McLoud: Is the widow of C. M. McLoud; that she is familiar with the services of her husband in the prosecution of the Old Settlers' claim; made seven trips to Washington with her husband in one year on the business; that he, with Erwin, spent almost the entire winter of 1876-77 in Washington engaged on said claim; that she did not accompany him on all of his trips to Washington; that the journey was expensive, and he spent several thousand dollars in the prosecution of said claims, almost completely abandoning his practice at home; relates conversations her husband had in her presence with Judge Robert P. Dick, judge United States court for the western district of North Carolina, and with her father, and that he expected large compensation from the work he was doing on the case; that his health failed in 1886, and he died in 1892.

Exhibit 7.—Is affidavit of the widow of Marcus Erwin: That she frequently heard discussions between her husband and McLoud and others concerning the prosecution of the Old Settlers' claim; that from 1876 to 1881, inclusive, her husband was in Washington during every session of Congress; that he spent large sums of money in paying his expenses there while engaged in prosecuting said claim, often staying for a month after Congress adjourned; that he spent all he had made for several years prior to entering upon the case, and neglected his home practice, and died leaving her penniless; that in consequence she has had a struggle to rear her family, being compelled to move on an average of about twice a year, and she became indifferent about preserving her husband's papers, at one time burning a barrel full of papers, mostly on Indian matters; that she often begged her husband to give up the business of prosecuting said claim, but he said he could not afford to do so, and that some day he would be well compensated.

Exhibit 8.—Is affidavit of J. E. Rankin, cashier Battery Park Bank, Asheville, as to the character, standing, and ability as a lawyer of C. M. McLoud.

Exhibit 9.—Is affidavit of Charles A. Webb, the administrator of the estate of C. M. McLoud, deceased.

Upon the testimony, etc., thus produced before the Department of the Interior, the attorneys for the claimants were informed that the facts of contract and service were established, but that the value of the service was not set forth in such manner as to enable the Assistant Attorney-General to state the amount that should be allowed, and further proof was called for as to the money value of the services rendered, whereupon the affidavits, of which the following synopses are given, were filed:

Exhibit 10.—Affidavit of Hon. Robert B. Vance: services were laborious and required close attention and much skill; thinks $50,000 a reasonable estimate of the services rendered by McLoud and Erwin.

Exhibit 11.—Affidavit of W. W. Rollins: knows of his own knowledge of the services of McLoud, Erwin, and McPherson in prosecuting said "Old Settlers' claim"; that McPherson devoted a great deal of time to the matter while McLoud and Erwin were in Washington, and also while they were at their homes in North Carolina; that McLoud and Erwin expended several thousand dollars in actual expenses for themselves and others whose evidence was necessary before committees of Congress; thinks a reasonable estimate of the value of the services is from $30,000 to $40,000; thinks the latter sum nearer the correct value of the services rendered by the three.

Exhibit 12.—Affidavit of M. W. Robertson: that McLoud and Erwin could have earned from $30,000 to $35,000 out of their home practice during the six years they were prosecuting the "Old Settlers' claim"; that their services and money expended were worth the latter sum as a reasonable estimate.

Exhibit 13.—Affidavit by James Taylor, Cherokee, N. C.; McLoud, Erwin, and McPherson were the first attorneys employed after the "Old Settlers' convention of 1875. Consequently their services were difficult, laborious, and hard, and were worth from $25,000 to $30,000 at a conservative estimate. They would have earned, with the same diligence, etc., at their home practice or in other matters fully the latter sum.

Exhibit 14.—Is letters of administration to Lucius H. Smith, Buncombe County, N. C., of the estate of Marcus Erwin, deceased, and power of attorney from said Smith to Charles A. Webb, of Asheville, N. C.

After consideration of the proofs presented and hearing given to the attorneys representing the three claimants, the Assistant Attorney-General gave them to understand that he would recommend an allowance to be made on the claims to the Secretary of the Interior; but he declined to inform them as to the amount of the allowance so recommended by him; and the Secretary has said that he could not pay the claim until the restrictions of Senate resolution of March 2, 1895, were removed, and advised them that they secure the removal of these restrictions by a resolution, which is sought to be done by Senate resolution No. 74.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I sought by the Senate resolution, to which I have referred, to have a former resolution modified so as to permit the Secretary of the Interior to adjust those claims. The resolution, as I stated, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and in response to the resolution the amounts fixed in the bill were placed there as the compensation to the parties for the services they have rendered.

I know nothing about the claims of my own knowledge. I simply have the facts as stated in the various affidavits which have been filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. I know one thing, and that is that Major Erwin was a gentleman, and I am satisfied that neither he nor his representatives would file a claim in the Congress of the United States asking to be paid for services never rendered. I also know Major McLoud. He was one of the most prominent attorneys in our State, and I am satisfied that he rendered the services as alleged in the paper read by the Secretary. While we would much prefer that the Secretary of the Interior should have considered this matter, at the same time the Committee on Indian Affairs have preferred to take the other course. They have said to us, "Rather than to modify the resolution and let this controversy continue before the Secretary of the Interior, we prefer to settle the whole matter at one time"; and they have cut down the claims of these individuals from $30,000 to $10,000.

Mr. PLATT. Fifteen thousand dollars.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Fifteen thousand dollars in bulk; but I was referring only to the claim of McLoud and Erwin. I know nothing as to the claim of Mr. McPherson, except to say that he is a gentleman. He hails from a different State. But these gentlemen lived in my State in their lifetime.

The entire amount allowed to these people, the amount that they have proven the services were worth, was $30,000, and it has been scaled one-half by the committee. I take it the committee thought the best thing to do was to settle the matter while they had it before them; to settle all these amounts and scale them down, so as to give each individual what he would be entitled to in equity. They are not getting their legal rights. If they were getting the amounts they are legally entitled to the bill would include an appropriation for $30,000. But I take it the committee has granted these people what they think is equitable.

It is true they did not get their claims considered before the Secretary of the Interior when the other claims were considered. The way they account for that is this: They say Major Erwin had died and they had to have an administrator appointed. Captain McLoud had died, and they had to have an administrator appointed in that case. Pending the appointment of the administrators in those two cases the claims were considered by the Secretary of the Interior. I feel confident that the Committee on Indian Affairs, while I have not the honor to be a member of that body, have done what they conceive to be for the best interests of the Indians and for the best interests of all parties concerned. This fund, I understand, was set aside for the payment of attorneys' fees. So it is more in the nature of an adjustment of the amount due these individuals than in the nature of an appropriation from the Government to pay the attorneys for services rendered.

I do not care to say anything more about the matter. I know nothing about it individually; but I know that they have established the fact that they had a contract under which they were entitled to a certain sum of money. I further know the fact that they have proven that they rendered the services. It is admitted here that they have rendered the services, and it is also admitted here that the consideration for the services has been scaled one-half. I can see no good reason, no just cause, for disallowing this amount to these individuals.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I have no knowledge as to these particular claims, whether they are sound or unsound. I do think it strange that if the claimants are entitled to the large sums awarded them by this clause there has not been earlier prosecution of their case to an adjudication by some tribunal. No one has yet said that these amounts are due except the Committee on Indian Affairs or the Committee on Appropriations of this body. We do not know as the case stands to which committee we are indebted for this list. We do not know which committee has made up the list and decided that each of these parties shall have the sum set against his name.

This is either the money of Joel M. Bryan that we are appropriating in this way, or it is the money of the United States. If it is the money of the United States, then none of these contracts are sound and legal unless they were made under section 2103 of the Revised Statutes, which is so long that I will not insert it in the RECORD, but it distinctly provides that any contract which is to bind an Indian tribe shall be executed with certain formalities and shall be approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior. Joel M. Bryan's contract appears to have been so approved. I think it was an extravagant and an exorbitant contract; but there it stands. The amendment proposes not to give Mr. Bryan all this money, but before giving any to Mr. Bryan to award these various sums to the different parties named. Mr. William S. Peabody is to be given $29,000, who, as I said, has already been paid $3,000. The estate of McLoud, the estate of Erwin, and Mr. McPherson are to be given $5,050 each. There was no contract made with them under section 2103 of the Revised Statutes, and their claim never had any adjudication whatever until the two committees now propose these amounts. By some process it has been ascertained that Mary E. Carey, executrix of the estate of James J. Newell, who has had $10,000, is to have $3,000 more. John A. Sibbald is to have $1,000. He has already had $2,700. Reese H. Voorhees and John Paul Jones are to have $7,003.86, who have already had $32,000.

Mr. WILSON. May I interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire right there?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. Has the Senator from New Hampshire read in the protest of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians the statement that I made relative to that item? Perhaps the Senator was not present when I read it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not remember to have read it.

Mr. WILSON. I will read it again, with the Senator's permission:

It is conceded by those in whose behalf this protest is made that the provision contained in the proposed amendment for the payment of Reese H. Voorhees and John Paul Jones, the amount of $7,003.86 is just and proper, and should be paid; and that it is only a fair and reasonable compensation to these gentlemen for the valuable services rendered.

That is in the protest that I understand the Senator from New Hampshire is supporting. Their bill has passed the other House and it has been before the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator admit that those two gentlemen have already received $32,000?

Mr. WILSON. The amount that they received, the $32,000, has nothing to do with this contract, which was made subsequently. I introduced a bill in the Senate, and that is the reason why I feel some interest in the matter. I went all over the papers. They gave a year and a half of service.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I will suggest to him that these two gentlemen were attorneys at law and were concerned with Mr. Garland in the prosecution of the case originally in the Court of Claims and in the Supreme Court.

Mr. CHANDLER. What was the $32,000 paid to them for?

Mr. TELLER. Thirty-two thousand dollars was paid to them for that service, as I understand. They have rendered other services. They had a contract—

Mr. CHANDLER. I have before me—

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator permit me to explain?

Mr. CHANDLER. Excuse me, I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. TELLER. They had a contract made according to law, approved by the proper officers, and under it the Secretary of the Interior paid them the full amount of their contract.

Mr. CHANDLER. My impression is, from a memorandum which is before me, that Messrs. Voorhees and Jones were paid $32,000 for services in the prosecution of the Old Settlers' claim, and that the claim which is now allowed was for another service.

Defending the money recovered by the Indians from the Government against all spurious, unauthentic, or unreasonable claims of attorneys or other persons claiming to have rendered services in securing or aiding in the collection of the Old Settlers' claim.

So, having received $32,000 themselves, they are now to have $7,003.86 for defending the Indians from the unreasonable claims of other attorneys. That is a very singular state of things. It seems these Indians had to make a contract to pay out 35 per cent of all they could recover, and then they had to make additional contracts to protect themselves from the unreasonable claims of attorneys, and they had to pay large sums to new attorneys to protect them from the unreasonable claims of attorneys whom they had already employed. I do not say that these amounts are not due, but I ask, where is the adjudication that they are due which is to justify the Senate in making this appropriation?

Now we come to Mr. McKnight's claim of $1,000. Mr. McKnight, as I said a little while ago, is the surviving partner of Mr. E. J. Ellis. The original contract with Mr. Ellis was for 2 per cent on the appropriation of $800,000, which would have made a claim of $16,000. They have been paid $4,000. They are now claiming before Congress the sum of $12,000. They are prosecuting that claim before this body; they are prosecuting that claim before the House of Representatives. Who has adjudicated that they are entitled to only $1,000? What is the justification for reducing the amount? I admit it may be necessary that it should be reduced, but should it not be done by some tribunal? Should it not be done by some adjudication? If done by a committee of this body, should it not be done in pursuance of a report which shows the grounds for the action of the committee of this body before we are asked to approve these specific sums as due to these people? We are asked to adjudicate that $29,000 is due to Mr. Peabody, who has already had $3,000. Why? Because that is the judgment of the Senator from Colorado, the Senator from Connecticut, and the Senator from South Dakota. We are also asked to adjudicate to Mr. McKnight—

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CHANDLER. In one moment, as soon as I utter this sentence. We are also asked to adjudicate that Mr. McKnight's claim for $12,000 is to be reduced to $1,000. How is that? What are we to say to Mr. McKnight when he comes here after this bill is passed and asks for an additional $11,000? Now I will yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from

New Hampshire that in this case Mr. Peabody's claim was not adjudicated by me. He had a contract. The Committee on Indian Affairs had charge of it, not myself, although I think that he is entitled to more money than he is getting. I have detailed some of the services he has rendered.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator think that the Old Settlers ought to have paid 85 per cent of all they recovered to attorneys?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to answer?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. Bryan has the contract for the whole $79,000, and has also filed a claim for the entire amount, shutting out everybody. He has made an affidavit, which is here, showing in detail what his services were, and that they were not paid for.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very good; and we are called upon by an act of Congress to legislate the money away from him and into the pockets of these people. We are called upon to handle all this sum of money without any report from the committee stating the reasons, and when we know that every one of these claimants who has not had allowed to him by these two committees the sum which he claims will come and complain to Congress hereafter and ask for more money, and when we have not any reason for overruling the findings of the Secretary of the Interior except a clause in an appropriation bill reported from the committee, not accompanied by any statement of reasons for the conclusions which the committee have reached.

Mrs. Belva A. Lockwood is to be paid $1,000. How much does she claim? She claims that her contract was for $80,000. Why has the committee cut this woman down $79,000 and given us no reason for cutting down the amount of her claim from $80,000 to $1,000?

Mr. TELLER. I will tell the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why should not the women be treated just as well as the men in this game of distribution?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator does not ask a question for information, but only asks to hear himself talk, I do not care about interrupting him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose it would be more agreeable to hear the Senator talk, and therefore I will yield if he wants me to yield.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator really wants to know why the sum was cut down—

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly I do; but the Senator got angry a little while ago when I asked him a question; and he can answer or not, just as he pleases.

Mr. TELLER. I did not get angry at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator refused to allow me to interrupt him to ask a question, and now he wants to ask me a question. Every question put in the course of my argument, unless disclaimed—

Mr. TELLER. I will not interrupt the Senator. The Senator evidently does not desire to have the truth.

Mr. CHANDLER. I recognize the Senator as the fount of all truth, and now I will ask him why he cut down the claim of Mrs. Lockwood from $80,000 to $1,000?

Mr. TELLER. I did not cut down the claim of Mrs. Lockwood. Mrs. Lockwood had no contract at all. Mrs. Lockwood rendered some service as the agent of Mr. Newell, and out of Mr. Newell's fund the committee thought she was entitled to that amount of money. She had no contract. The Senator is entirely mistaken. If he knew the facts as well as he thinks he knows them he would get along a great deal better.

Mr. CHANDLER. Having said that the Senator is the fount of all knowledge, it seems to me he might have left a little presumption that I know something myself. It is the privilege of any Senator to ask questions of a committee that advocates a bill. When the Senator advocates the payment of these large sums of money and I ask him a question about them and he answers it, it is not gracious nor courteous for him to wind up by telling the Senator who asked the question that he does not know as much as he ought to know. He is trying to find out, and he gets mighty little information from the committee that has this matter in charge. He gets bad temper enough, but very little information. I continue to ask how it is that we are to be guaranteed against the pressure of Mrs. Lockwood upon Congress for the remaining $79,000 when the committee have given her $1,000 and have acknowledged thereby that she is entitled to something?

Mr. President, I do not undertake to say that I know anything about the details of these claims. My argument is that I do not know anything about them, and that the Senate does not know anything about them, and that it has no information upon which to base the action which is proposed by this amendment. I say if there was an adjudication here by the Secretary of the Interior I might be willing and probably should be willing to vote in accordance therewith. There is no such adjudication. The Secretary of the Interior has made his adjudication of smaller sums and they have been paid. There is no adjudication of the Court of Claims, as perhaps there ought to be, upon these cases. There is merely this clause in the pending appropriation bill proposing that we shall vote these sums through the Senate because we find them reported by the Committee on Appropriations. Now, I say it is not a satisfactory way of doing business. It is not the satisfactory way of finding out how much, if anything, is due to these parties. I give notice to the Senate that if this schedule becomes a law Congress will be pestered from this time on by claimants who will say they were not allowed what they ought to have been allowed, and they will come to Congress and ask that justice may be done to them, Congress having undertaken to make the adjudication and to determine that these payments shall be made and no other payments shall be made.

I submit, Mr. President, that these claims should take the way of other claims; that if they are to be put upon an appropriation bill they should be put upon the appropriation bill in pursuance of something which can be handed to a Senator or published to the outside world as a reason why this list of claims is just, carefully made, and accurate, and is good not only to the extent to which it goes, but is a protection against any other claims of a like character that may be presented to Congress.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I feel very much like thanking the Senator from New Hampshire that in his zeal in attacking this appropriation bill he has not gone so far as some other Senators to say that the proposed appropriation is a fraud and a theft. I think that the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs and the members of the Committee on Appropriations owe a great deal to the forbearance of the Senator from New Hampshire and that they should express their obligation to him when he comes to their defense and says that he really does not think the members of the Appropriations Committee who have examined these items and the members of the Indian Affairs Committee, who I think it will be conceded by and by have examined these items, are not frauds and thieves. Really we owe a great deal to him, Mr. President, and for one I feel like expressing that obligation.

But while the imputation of personal dishonesty upon these two committees is now disavowed, it is a pretty serious thing to stand up in the Senate of the United States and say that the payment of claims represented by these committees will be fraudulent and in the nature of a theft from the Indians. That charge could not be made except upon one of two grounds, that the claims had not been considered fairly and justly, or that there was an intention to commit fraud.

As the charge of intentional imposition upon the Senate of fraudulent and wicked claims is abandoned so far as it relates to the personnel of the committees who have brought them forward, it remains to inquire whether the claims are here as the result of inattention or carelessness or want of investigation, or for any other reason which militates against the acceptance of this amendment.

I will give the history of the claims, and I speak of the matter, and speak somewhat feelingly, because I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. When the present Congress met bills were introduced providing for payment out of this fund in the Treasury to attorneys who had rendered services in obtaining a judgment for and payment of about $300,000 to the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians. It has been complained here that these claims ought to be adjusted upon the introduction of bills and the investigation of bills and a report upon the bills. I think there has been a bill introduced for every one, or nearly every one, of these claims. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] rose and stated what he had endeavored to do. The bills came before Congress and they came before the Indian Affairs Committee by reference to that committee, and there a subcommittee was appointed early in the session. That subcommittee consisted of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHoup] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON], and they devoted a very considerable time, week after week, to the investigation of the claims.

The Senator from New Hampshire complains that there is no adjudication of these claims. I venture to say that no subcommittee or any committee in Congress has ever devoted more attention to the consideration of claims brought before Congress than did the members of that subcommittee. They made a report to the full Committee on Indian Affairs. That report was accompanied by a written memorandum of the facts relating to each case; and when it was presented to the Committee on Indian Affairs and explained by the subcommittee it received the unanimous consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Perhaps these are all fraudulent claims. Perhaps the subcommittee and the other members of the Committee on Indian Affairs are not capable of detecting a fraudulent and thieving claim against the Government. But the same argument applies to every case. The same argument which the Senator from New Hampshire has urged here applies to every case which comes before Congress, where Congress is asked to pay an honest claim, that it has not been adjudicated except by the committee and that it has received only the examination given it by the committee. It will not be three weeks before the Senator from New Hampshire will come in here with a report upon some subject, and when a Senator rises and asks him where and when it was adjudicated, he will say, "I have investigated the matter as a member of the committee; the committee to which I belong, the Naval Committee, hearing the facts, have come to the conclusion that this is a proper report." That is the way in which all claims are adjudicated against the Government for the payment of which the Government is responsible. It is the usual course.

Would it have been better to have had a dozen bills reported here and acted upon separately than that they should have been consolidated and proposed as an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill?

After the matter had received the sanction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I believe the unanimous approbation of every member of the committee, it went to the Appropriations Committee. The same yellow paper memoranda from which the Senator has been reading and the same arguments which the Senator has been retelling here were laid before the Appropriations Committee, emanating, I believe, from somebody who thinks he has not got as much of this money as he ought to have. The Appropriations Committee have not passed this subject by slightly. They have given care and attention to it, and have in some respects modified the recommendations of the Indian Committee. They have not exactly adopted the recommendations of that committee.

Mr. President, why is it that Senators say that these claims are fraudulent; that they are an attempt to steal something from the Indians; that they have not been considered, and have not been adjudicated? I think I can tell why it is. First, there are some attorneys who think that they have not been fairly dealt with here—some of whose claims, or alleged claims, have been disallowed entirely, some of whom have not got as much as they think they ought to have gotten. That is one class of people who are objecting here. Then there is the Cherokee Nation, by its delegates here, which has not an iota of just claim as a nation upon this money, claiming to represent the Old Settlers, who, after having voted this money away for the purpose of collecting this claim and giving all the balance of it by a vote of the council to Mr. Bryan, their original commissioner, come in and say they want the money. These two parties, the attorneys who think they have not got quite enough and the Cherokee Nation and the Old Settlers who, after the old fashion of Indian giving—give and take back—have excited the philanthropic sympathy of the Indian Rights Association, and so this attack is made upon the payment of these claims.

Now, just a word about the claims. I do not think much of contingent fees, but every prosecution of an Indian claim against the Government and every recovery of an Indian claim against the Government, and every prosecution of almost every other claim against the Government and recovery against the Government, is conducted just in this way. Attorneys take such claims upon contracts to receive so much in case they succeed. I do not think much of it, but the necessity of that sort of employment of attorneys grows out of the negligence of this Government in paying claims it ought to pay. The people who have these claims against the Government ordinarily can not employ attorneys and pay them, and the Government refuses to pay, as it refused to pay these Old Settlers $800,000, which it owed them for fifty years, more or less. They were forced to put their claims into the hands of attorneys, who took them for a contingent fee. Here was this old claim against the Government in behalf of these settlers—fifty years old, was it not, I inquire of the Senator from Arkansas? I think it dates back as far as 1838.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think it is more than 60 years old. I think it originated from the treaties of 1832 and 1833.

Mr. PLATT. Yes. This claim has been pending against the Government. It has been claimed by these Old Settlers that the Government owed them this large amount of money. They never could get any payment from the Government, and, as a result, they made a contract with Mr. Joel M. Bryan, whom they made their agent to prosecute this claim, and gave him full power and agreed to pay him 35 per cent of what they should recover. They did not know how much it might be; it might be $100,000; it might be a million dollars. Mr. Bryan took the case under that contract.

When the Indians say this money belongs to them it is a violation of a contract on their part. They have no claim on it; and if they ever had a claim on it they have since then, and deliberately, agreed to give to Joel M. Bryan all that may be left of the 35 per cent after the payment of the other attorneys who have claims upon the fund. This operates, if these payments are not to be made out of this fund, as a matter of confiscation on the part of the United States, and I say that the $36,000 belongs to some one who has rendered services. It does not belong to the Indians; it does not belong to the United States; it belongs unquestionably to the parties who have rendered services under that original contract. If there are no payments to be made, then the United States is simply to confiscate this $80,000. It can not be paid back to the Indians, or any portion of it; they can not recover it.

Now, let us take one claim here, for there is no time to go through all of the claims. When the Indian Committee investigated this subject a memorandum of a report was drawn up with reference to each one of the claims, setting forth fully the facts in relation to it. Take the claim of Mr. Peabody. I do not know Mr. Peabody; I never saw him. I know that he is a citizen of Colorado, and I know the Senator from Colorado says he is a worthy and estimable attorney and gentleman. What are the facts about that claim? When it was undetermined how much this recovery was going to be in the inception of it, Mr. Bryan, who was the agent of these Indians and had plenary power, made a contract with Mr. Peabody to give him 8 per cent of the amount which should be recovered.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I ask whether it is not true that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior allowed to Mr. Peabody all that that officer thought he ought to have?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, Mr. President, I do not wish to be impolite to the Senator; I shall not be, and I could not be; but this practice when a Senator is making a statement with regard to a particular subject, and thinks he is making a good statement, and intends to make a complete statement, of getting up and asking him something with reference to a particular subject before he gets to it is scarcely a proper method of discussion.

Mr. PALMER. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will say that I offend against that rule of politeness perhaps as rarely as any other Senator.

Mr. PLATT. I will say that.

I was coming to the particular subject to which the Senator has referred. I was going to examine the Peabody claim, because it may be treated as a sample claim. It has been styled the fraudulent claim of a lobbyist for a year's service. Mr. President, let us look at the claim a little. Mr. Peabody made a contract with Mr. Bryan, the agent of these Indians, who was authorized to make the contract. That contract was that he should receive 8 per cent of the amount collected. That can not be denied and is not denied.

It is said that Mr. Peabody never rendered services adequate to the amount of his contract. I do not think that question comes very fairly into this case, though I suppose that it is customary in the Interior Department to examine the question of services, and not to give the full amount of the contract if it be found that the services have not been rendered. But when was Mr. Peabody employed? How long ago was it? It was said here in the Senate that it was the work of a lobbyist for a year. Mr. Peabody was employed by Mr. Bryan on the 9th day of September, 1892. That is nearly fourteen years ago. So this service ran over a period of thirteen years up to the time of the collection of the money. His contract recited that there was 35 per cent set aside to pay the expenses, of which he was to have 8 per cent for his services. This contract was approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in 1893. On the 6th of December, 1896, it was continued in force for a period of nine years from December 9, 1892, by the original parties to the contract, Mr. Bryan, the agent of the Indians, and Mr. Peabody. It was again approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs January 27, 1897, and the Secretary of the Interior. It was again renewed and extended on the 10th of February, 1892, approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the 9th of March, 1892, and the Secretary of the Interior March 11, 1892. It was in full force and effect when this money was paid.

Now, do Senators come in here and say that Mr. Peabody is a fraudulent claimant, with this contract in existence since 1892, renewed and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior three different times? I venture to say from what I have learned in this case that if Mr. Peabody had not been employed to do the work which he did, or if some other person had not been employed to do that work, there would have been no recovery in this case. I think that Mr. Garland, late Attorney-General, has practically said that. Mr. Peabody was an expert accountant, familiar with statistics and accounts, and his business as an attorney was to look up and state this claim through all its multifarious complications for the last sixty years. He did it so successfully that the Indians recovered $900,000, which they never would have been able to recover and never would have recovered if it had not been for the industry and skill of Mr. Peabody, or some man of precisely the same character and caliber in looking up the evidence and presenting it originally before the commissioner appointed by the Interior Department, and subsequently putting it in shape for the Court of Claims. The Secretary of the Interior now says for that service, extending over a period of twelve years, there being $280,000 set aside for the payment of attorneys by the Indians themselves, that all Mr. Peabody is entitled to is $8,000.

There are some very peculiar things about the case. The Indian Commissioner recommended $8,000, although he said that Mr. Peabody had forfeited the right to recover anything under his contract by reason of having been employed for two years in the Geological Survey. The case was before the Court of Claims, and although he said that the service which was rendered to Mr. Clements, the commissioner, was unimportant—that was the commissioner's report—he recommended the payment of $8,000. The Secretary of the Interior, acting upon that recommendation, while he negated the findings of the commissioner, and said there was nothing in the fact of Mr. Peabody's employment in the Geological Survey which prevented him from recovering the worth of his services, and while he negated the fact that his services in connection with the report of Mr. Clements were unimportant, allowed him only $8,000.

Let us see if that is not so. This is what the Secretary of the Interior says about it:

The claim of W. S. Peabody.—Upon this claim I am of opinion that Mr. Peabody's acceptance of employment under the Government of the United States can not be considered an abandonment of his contract.

The commissioner said the contract had been abandoned.

The proof filed shows that he performed very valuable services during a period of many years, extending from the year 1873 to the close of the case. I have carefully considered his claim, and I cannot think that, however valuable and meritorious these services may have been, he is entitled to the enormous sum at which he rates them. I agree with you that the sum of $8,000 would be ample compensation for all the services rendered; and that sum is allowed.

That is a most remarkable judgment on the part of the Secretary of the Interior. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs based the reduction of the claim upon two reasons: One that Mr. Peabody had abandoned his contract, and the other that his services were not worth anything. And yet he recommended $8,000 upon that basis. The Secretary of the Interior negated both of those grounds upon which the commissioner made the recommendation and only allowed Mr. Peabody the $8,000 which the commissioner had allowed. I want to read that again. This is the statement of Secretary Hoke Smith:

The claim of W. S. Peabody.—Upon this claim I am of opinion that Mr. Peabody's acceptance of employment under the Government of the United States can not be considered an abandonment of his contract. The proof filed shows that he performed very valuable services during a period of many years, extending from the year 1873 to the close of the case.

A lobbyist who is to be paid $29,000 for going around to Senators and spending a year's time! The Secretary of the Interior says the proof filed shows that Mr. Peabody "performed very valuable services during a period of many years, extending from the year 1873 to the close of the case."

The finding of the Secretary of the Interior in this matter was not conclusive. Mr. Peabody had a right to present his claim under his contract to Congress. His contract called for $64,000, and I venture to say from all my reading in the case that he rendered just as important services as any attorney in this case out of court or in court, and is entitled to just as much compensation. I am willing to let this amendment stand on this sample claim of Mr. Peabody. I think he has fairly made out his case here, as I think the rest of them have.

But, Mr. President, in the usual way in which these cases go on, employing attorney after attorney, discharging attorneys and employing new ones, it always happens that the claims presented by attorneys who have rendered services run up to a very large figure; and there was left over only the sum of $36,000. There were claims upon it by attorneys to the amount of about $200,000, which were presented to Congress, as they had a right to present them, and the place where they should be presented, and referred to the committee where they should be referred, and adjudicated as they should be adjudicated, let me say to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. So it came to this, that there had to be a sort of rude justice done between these different claimants, or one of three things must follow, to use the expressive and almost classic language of the Senator from New Hampshire, Congress would be forever pestered with these claims, or the United States would confiscate the money, as the Senator about half intimated it ought to do, or give it to Joel M. Bryan. So the Committee on Indian Affairs, through its subcommittee and its whole committee, with the most tedious and careful and painstaking examination of these cases, came to the conclusion as to what should be paid to the different claimants, making as nearly as they could a fair adjustment of these claims, a rude kind of justice and equity perhaps it was, but I venture to say that upon any one of the claims in that bill considered by itself the claim would be very much larger than it is as finally adjusted. Then, as I say, the claim went to the Appropriations Committee, and the Appropriations Committee went over all this work, and now Senators come in and say it is all fraudulent, thievery, and stealing from the Indians. Mr. President, if that be so, let us advance that argument in every case which has been examined—carefully, thoroughly, and comprehensively examined—by a committee. Oh, no, Mr. President, that will not do.

I should not have said a word in this case if it had not been that, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I gave my assent to the amendment as reported to the Appropriations Committee. The Appropriations Committee, following it mainly, has changed it in some respects, and, as the Senator in charge of this bill tells you, in a manner that all the claimants who had claims of any validity whatever are substantially satisfied. Now, had we not better dispose of the subject?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I have endeavored since I have been a member of this body to observe its rules with great exactness. I have sought always to observe the rules of courtesy which ought to characterize the relations of Senators, but interruptions are so very frequent here, though generally by the consent of the Senators interrupted, that my interruption of the Senator from Connecticut seems hardly to have justified that discourteous snub that he retorted upon me. I am afraid that I have so conducted myself in this body that Senators imagine that I am incapable of feeling a snub tendered to me deliberately. I shall not notice the matter any further now; but I hope the Senator will pardon me for what he deemed an unusual discourtesy.

Mr. PLATT. If I said anything that the Senator thought was discourteous I did not intend to say it. I beg to assure him that I did not intend it. I would not say anything which by any means could be construed into disrespect or discourtesy to the Senator.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, that ends the matter so far as I am concerned.

I oppose the allowance of these claims, and I do it upon grounds which I think are fairly consistent with my respect for both the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations. I regard committees as important, valuable, and intelligent aids to the Senate. They are useful. They are somewhat like the referee, the master in chancery, in that forum to which I am much more accustomed than this. But I have never supposed that an exception to the report of a master, however able or intelligent, could be construed into an offense, except as Barrington says that in Ireland, if a lawyer demurred to a declaration, it was followed by an immediate challenge. I should be sorry to see the rule established in the Senate that no criticism could be made upon the action of a committee without incurring its resentment.

I listened to the very instructive remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] with great interest; and I understand this to be the state of facts: Long ago there were settlers in the Indian Territory called the Old Settlers, who were not regarded as a tribe or a nation, but as a sort of voluntary association, which could neither sue nor be sued, nor do I suppose, as a matter of law, it was capable of contracting; but a committee of that body did enter into some sort of arrangement with some agent for the prosecution of a claim against the United States; and as a result of the prosecution of that claim the United States became a trustee for that disorganized and, I suppose, somewhat incapable class of persons, that group of persons—for the term "group" describes them, I think, much more accurately than any other term I can think of at present. I understand, therefore, that these people were under the protection of the United States. The United States was a trustee, somewhat like a trustee for the incapable classes, the insane or minors, and the United States assumed all the responsibility of a trustee.

These persons made contracts that were sanctioned by the United States, and among the contracts which were made, I infer from the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], there was an order or resolution of this group adopted setting apart 35 per cent of whatever might be realized to compensate attorneys, or to compensate the particular attorney with whom the contract was made.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. PALMER. For a moment.

Mr. GORMAN. The pending bill, of course, can not be concluded to-night, and there are reasons which Senators understand why an adjournment should be had at this time. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 21, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 20, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Clerk of the House, Mr. ALEXANDER McDOWELL, who said: "In the absence of the Speaker, the House will please designate a Speaker pro tempore."

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, be, and is hereby, elected Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The question being put by the Clerk, the resolution was unanimously adopted.

The Speaker pro tempore on taking the chair was loudly applauded.

Prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN. The Clerk was proceeding to read the Journal of Saturday last, when the Speaker appeared and took the chair, amid laughter and applause.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The Clerk will read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last. The Journal was read and approved.

TESTS OF MATERIALS.

Mr. PERKINS, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print and bind in paper covers 500 copies of the report of the commanding officer of the Watertown Arsenal of tests of material for industrial and other purposes made at said arsenal during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1896.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

DONATIONS OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 8263) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish condemned cannon to certain Grand Army posts, a monument association, and army post, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, the authorized and directed to furnish to the Veteran Brigade, Grand Army of the Republic, Rochester, N. Y., eight pieces of condemned cannon for the purpose of decorating the burial lots in Mount Hope Cemetery and in the Holy Sepulchre Cemetery, set apart for the exclusive use of the veteran soldiers and sailors of the war of the rebellion, and also four pieces of condemned cannon to the Brockport Soldiers' Monument Association, an incorporated body, of Brockport, N. Y., for the decoration of the soldiers and sailors' monument recently erected in that village; also, two pieces of condemned cannon to the John C. Campbell Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Harrison, Ohio, for the use of its cemetery, and four condemned cannon for the use of the Soldiers' Home at Bennington, Vt.: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service, and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROMWELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PETER P. FERGUSON.

Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6431) to pay Peter P. Ferguson $1,765 and interest.

The bill was read.

Mr. CANNON. What is this about?

Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin. The Clerk will please read the report.

The report was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LOUD. This seems to be a just claim, but I think the bill should state for what this money is to be paid. I do not believe we should pass a bill which simply directs that a certain amount of money shall be paid to a certain individual and makes no statement of the matter for which payment is to be made. Unless the bill can be put in more specific shape I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the general deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8263) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first formal reading of the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] for a moment, does the gentleman desire any time for general debate on the bill?

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all. I think we can get through with it much more rapidly and more satisfactorily to the committee if we proceed to consider it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. Then I ask unanimous consent that the general debate may now be considered as closed, and that we proceed at once to read the bill for amendments under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

To James Bain, who was assaulted and injured in the State of Louisiana by residents of that State, $1,000.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information in reference to this matter.

This is an item of $1,000 for payment to one James Bain for an assault made upon him in the State of Louisiana. Now, I should like the gentleman in charge of the bill, my colleague, to state the circumstances of the assault and why it is a subject for appropriation by the General Government.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this item and the next items following it, three in number, are precisely of the same character, and have been examined by the Committee on Appropriations; but upon the recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—and I see my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT], in his seat, and would be glad to have him give an explanation of the matter, as he is more familiar with the facts than I am.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, this claim was transmitted to the House by the Secretary of State, who recommended the action which has been taken by the committee.

There is no method and no provision of law by which claims of this character can be indemnified in any other way than through an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. HOPKINS. I did not understand the statement of my colleague.

Mr. HITT. I say there is no method by which an applicant can have a claim of this character acted upon other than by having it transmitted to Congress, as was done in this case, on presentation by the British ambassador to our Government. The Secretary of State laid the matter before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with an urgent recommendation for immediate action upon it.

The British Government, through its ambassador, had asked for Bain the sum of $2,500, but after a great deal of discussion on the part of the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Foreign Affairs the sum of $1,000 has been fixed upon. Bain, in the disturbances mentioned in this item of the bill, was shot, and was a long time suffering from the consequences of the wound. He was subjected to very considerable expense for medical treatment, and it was thought, on a full consideration of the matter, that this was a fair sum, not too high, but sufficient to satisfy the British Government.

Mr. HOPKINS. If my colleague will allow me, was this in the city of New Orleans where the assault was made on this man? I see it says "in the State of Louisiana" in the item here.

Mr. HITT. It was in New Orleans. There was no assault. There are voluminous papers, giving the details and full explanations of the affair—

Mr. HOPKINS. But was this an assault that occurred in a street fight or riot?

Mr. HITT. Yes; it was during a riotous disturbance which took place on the street or wharf. The appropriation is provided in the bill precisely on the same principle as the payments heretofore made in the case of the Chinese slain at Rock Springs and the Mafia case at New Orleans, and cases arising in other places, where there was no provision of law to compensate the injured parties or no redress practicable through local courts.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like to ask if this assault was ever investigated by the municipal authorities immediately thereafter or at the time to determine as to whether this man was in any degree at fault in the matter?

Mr. HITT. There was an investigation and a report by the district attorney on the subject. The man was injured in a riot between the screw men and the longshoremen, certain labor organizations in the city, and the disturbance took place upon the wharf; this man not being a participant in it, but injured by shots fired by this crowd while he was at his duty. It is not certain as to whether he was shot accidentally or intentionally.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then, if I understand my colleague, this man belonged to one of two labor organizations which were engaged in a riot?

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, no; not at all. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, he had nothing to do with the organizations.

Mr. HITT. It was during a strike, when there was some labor trouble prevailing in the city between the labor organizations. This man, a British subject, was not engaged in the matter, but was shot either accidentally or purposely by some of these people. A number of persons were indicted—

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will allow me, this man, I believe, was an officer on an English ship, and was engaged in loading the ship at the time the disturbance took place. During the progress of the work of loading the ship the riot occurred along the wharves between the labor organizations and he was accidentally shot. He had nothing to do with either organization or with the riot.

Mr. HOPKINS. He was not engaged or employed in any American service then, as I understand it?

Mr. HITT. No; he was engaged in his duty as an officer of a British ship at the time. Six persons were indicted, as I was saying a moment ago, but no evidence was adduced proving who fired the shot. There was a total miscarriage of justice.

Mr. HOPKINS. While we are on this subject, I see that the next two items are appropriations for other persons named in the bill.

Mr. HITT. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Were these other persons injured in this same controversy or riot?

Mr. SAYERS. No; they are in different States. If the gentleman will read the bill he will see.

Mr. HITT. They are in other places, but the injuries originated similarly; that is, in disorders.

Mr. HOPKINS. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

To Frederick D. Dawson, wife, and daughter, for loss of property and bodily injuries inflicted in the State of Nebraska by residents of that State, $1,800; in all, $2,800.

Mr. KEM. I should like to have some explanation of the nature and circumstances of this claim.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman—and if that explanation does not answer the purpose I will turn him over to my colleague [Mr. HITT], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—that these three people, as shown by the papers sent to our committee from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, were three English subjects who were traveling in Nebraska. They were set upon, as shown by the reports of Nebraska officers, by a lot of ruffians or outlaws. Their property was destroyed, and they were very severely treated personally. Their claim for indemnity, preferred through the British minister, was quite a large one; but after an investigation of all the circumstances this is recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and concurred in by the Committee on Appropriations as an allowance to indemnify them.

Mr. KEM. These were British subjects, were they?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, my understanding with reference to this trouble, which took place in Sarpy County, is that it was a quarrel by words at first, but wound up in a fight.

The testimony is very conflicting, as I understand, as to who is really to blame, but I desire in this instance to call special attention to one thing, and that is whenever any subject of Great Britain is in trouble anywhere she looks after him, and I understand the British Government, through its authorized agents, paid just as much attention to this affair as if it was a great international complication. I wonder if this Government has asked France to pay anything for the incarceration of John Waller? I wonder if this Government has asked any other government for pay for injuries inflicted upon our citizens anywhere?

I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs if, after he has read the testimony taken in this Nebraska case, he feels justified in appropriating one cent in remuneration for injuries or supposed injuries received by the Dawson family? I am in receipt of letters from Nebraska that this was nothing but a common quarrel on the highway, and that the Dawsons were just as much to blame as the McCartys and the McCartys just as much to blame as the Dawsons. I do not know anything about the case, except as I receive information by correspondence, and hence do not care to express any judgment about the row. I have never even had the chance to read the testimony in the case. I understand, however, that the British Government actually asked the State of Nebraska to pay $40,000 because a little street fight took place in Sarpy County, but it has been cut down now to $2,800. If the payment of this sum will insure better protection to American citizens traveling abroad perhaps it will be good policy to allow the item to stand.

Mr. OWENS. What damage was inflicted upon these British subjects?

Mr. MERCER. I think one of the men had his eye pretty well pommelled, while others were more or less injured. As to the destruction of personal property, I am not informed.

Mr. SAYERS. The evidence is that some people outrageously mistreated a woman. That is one of the items in the damages.

Mr. MERCER. Does the testimony show that?

Mr. SAYERS. That is what I am told it shows.

Mr. HITT. The evidence in the State Department, which was transmitted here, shows that Mr. Dawson's daughter is now suffering from epilepsy as the result of the outrages inflicted by this gang of desperadoes. Here is the report of the attorney-general of Nebraska. There is no remedy under our laws.

In answer to another question, I will say that our laws differ from those of other countries which make these applications to us in that they afford a judicial channel through which applications can be made or suit brought for damages.

The Committee on the Judiciary of this House are now considering a bill to provide such a method in this country, by which Congress shall be forever rid of these claims, which can not now be settled in the courts.

In case of a claim for indemnity by an American citizen against the French, Belgian, German, or the English Government, there are tribunals open with jurisdiction; but these British subjects have no recourse except through their minister to our Government, and it has to be settled in this way or not at all. The committee thought it was impossible to get through this Congress a bill allowing the amount that was claimed, nor was it due, and after a careful investigation the amount was reduced to this small sum.

Mr. MERCER. Did they claim $40,000?

Mr. HITT. I do not know the amount of the claim that was made; but this amount is for what is believed to have been actually spent for medical attendance and other losses, and not anything in the way of sentiment for the wretchedness and the suffering that the family have been subjected to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to strike out the last two words. I infer from what the gentleman from Nebraska has said that this appropriation of $2,800 is put in this bill in accordance with the suggestion of the British ambassador. There is nothing in the bill, however, that indicates that Frederick Dawson, wife, and daughter are British subjects. I would like to know from my colleague, the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, what Mr. Dawson, wife, and daughter were doing out in Nebraska?

Mr. HITT. They had gone there and remained there for the time, but were still British subjects.

Mr. HOPKINS. Were they living in that State?

Mr. HITT. They were sojourning there.

Mr. HOPKINS. What do you mean by "sojourning" there? Were they there for the purpose of making that State their home?

Mr. HITT. They were there temporarily, I think, at a little town called Alliance.

Mr. MERCER. Oh, no.

Mr. HOPKINS. How long had they lived there?

Mr. HITT. I do not know. They were not living in Alliance. They are there now. They were passing through.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is there anything in the claim as made by the British ambassador to indicate whether it was a case of injury inflicted upon a British subject sojourning temporarily in this country, or whether it was done to a person who had left the British Kingdom for the purpose of coming to America and making America his future home?

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, if this Mr. Dawson had gone to Nebraska because of the great facilities afforded by that State for acquiring landed estate and building up a competency, and received these injuries, I think, Mr. Chairman, that he is not entitled to the consideration that would be given to an English subject under the conditions that I have just intimated; and for that reason I would like to know from the gentleman how long these Dawsons had lived in Nebraska, and whether they had gone there to make it their permanent home?

Mr. HITT. The communications from the British ambassador do not state what the intentions of these people were. They were British subjects who were there. I will read a letter from the ambassador of recent date with reference to the matter:

BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington, March 26, 1894.

SIR: With reference to my note of January 21 last, I have the honor to inform you that I have received a letter of a distressing character from Mrs.

Dawson, now at Alliance, Nebr., describing the sufferings of her daughter from violent attacks of epilepsy brought on by the cruel outrages committed on her and her family by the McCarty gang of desperadoes.

Mrs. Dawson, who has been reduced to extreme misery by this last misfortune, as she can not leave her daughter to go out and work, has asked me, as a matter of charity, to defray the cost of travel of the family to Tacoma, where a brother of Mr. Dawson resides; and while informing you of the above, I have the honor to inquire whether the further investigations of the governor of Nebraska have yet been concluded and whether there is a prospect of some relief being granted at an early date to the sufferers.

I have the honor, etc.,

JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

The Secretary was unable to give him any assurance of any prospect of relief through the courts in January, and as it was desirable that the subject should be closed, and as the question might be made a source of irritation, and as it was a small matter of money, this course was taken and the claim sent to be treated like similar claims in the past.

Mr. HOPKINS. My colleague does not answer my question, as to whether these Dawsons had gone to the State of Nebraska to make it their permanent home.

Mr. HITT. There is nothing in the correspondence that shows what their intentions were. I only know from it that they are British subjects and seem to be respectable people.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is there any evidence before your committee showing how long they had been in the State of Nebraska before this trouble occurred?

Mr. HITT. There is not.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two upon this subject. From the statement made by my friend from the Omaha district [Mr. MERCER] it appears that these persons, these Dawsons, were of the same class of citizens as the McCarty, that have been characterized in such rough language by the British ambassador. It appears, also, that they had left their native country for the purpose of coming here to make it their permanent home. Now, if that is so, I see no reason why they should have any further or different privileges than American citizens. If these Dawsons had been native Americans, or if they had taken out their last citizenship papers, this controversy would have been one that would have been settled in the local courts of the State of Nebraska; and if there had been an injury such as is claimed by the British ambassador, the courts of that State would have been open to them for just compensation for such damages. But under this statement these Dawsons, for aught we know, might have lived in that State ten years, they might have acquired the title to real estate, they might have accumulated personal property, they might have enjoyed all the rights enjoyed by citizens of that State, yet when they get into a street brawl or any trouble of this kind they invoke the protection of the British flag, and attempt to filch money from the Treasury of the United States. I say that under such conditions no appropriation should be made for this purpose.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this claim comes recommended by the Secretary of State, after full investigation made in connection with the governor and the attorney-general of Nebraska, and also with the British minister, the whole matter supervised finally by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who certified it to the Committee on Appropriations with a request that a limited appropriation be made in the bill.

Mr. KEM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. In a minute. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not given this matter careful study. I did glance at the allegations made, from which it appeared that these parties had been roughly dealt with. There appears to be no doubt that they are British subjects. The appropriation is not in order upon this bill if any gentleman had seen proper to make the point of order or to reserve the point; either my colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] or the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER], and, speaking of myself as one member of the Committee of the Whole, if either of those gentlemen will rise now in his place and make the point of order, I will not object that it is too late.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to raise the point of order against this item if the appropriation is a just one, but I represent the district in which this outrage is alleged to have occurred and I desire to know something about it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No; you do not.

Mr. KEM. If it occurred at Alliance it was in my district.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It occurred in Sarpy County.

Mr. CANNON. As I am informed, it did not occur in the gentleman's district [Mr. KEM's]. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the nature of things it is impossible for any committee of this House to exhaust a question of this kind. The claim is one that could not be enforced against this Government except as good faith; and our treaty obligations may require that it should be enforced, just as we have enforced our claim against the Chinese Government for wrongs done to American citizens to the extent of many thousands of dollars. The British Government in this matter is standing by the citizens, just as we stand by ours when wrongs are committed upon them in foreign lands. I do not pretend to say of my own knowledge that there is any merit in this claim, but I do say that the Secretary of State, after full investigation, recommends that an appropriation be made. The British minister claims it, our own Committee on Foreign Affairs recommends it, and therefore we have placed it in the bill; but, as I said before, a point of order will take it out.

Mr. LIVINGSTON rose.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word with the view of submitting some observations on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] is recognized.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the recommendation of this appropriation is in keeping with all international custom and practice. We are trying now to get some recognition and some compensation for insult, wrong, and oppression committed upon an American citizen in Cuba, Mr. Diaz, a Baptist minister. This is in accordance with our own practice for a hundred years and with the practice of other nations for a hundred years or more, and the only question that I suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] wants to raise here is whether this claim is well founded as matter of fact.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is right.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Whether this money ought to be paid as a matter of justice.

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, I want to say to the gentleman that to the best of our ability we have looked into this matter. The Committee on Appropriations not only inquired into it, but we had the advantage of the information which we could obtain from the State Department and the recommendation of our distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who seems to have familiarized himself with the matter.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. The question that I propounded to my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, was intended to get at the length of time that these people had lived in Nebraska. If they were simply temporary sojourners there, that is one thing; but if in fact they had gone there intending to become residents of that State and had neglected to take out their papers of citizenship, that would put an entirely different color upon the case, to my mind.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In answer to that I will say to the gentleman that there are no facts before the Committee of the Whole, and none were laid before the Committee on Appropriations, touching that question, but the presumption is—and it is a legal presumption—

Mr. HOPKINS (interposing). If the gentleman will permit me right there, what I criticize is that any appropriation should be sought to be made here on a presumption. We ought not to make an appropriation on a presumption. We ought to know the facts.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Wait until I complete my sentence. I say the legal and the reasonable presumption is that these people were there prospecting and had not yet determined whether they would become citizens of the United States or not.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman's whole question is irrelevant at any rate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Of course it is irrelevant, but I wanted to answer the gentleman from Illinois. The facts that we have before us show that the people were there simply prospecting and had not determined whether they would become citizens or not. In the meantime this wrong was done to them. Now, I want to say to you, gentlemen of the Committee of the Whole, that there is no way out of this business except to pay the claim. If you intend to protect your own citizens in foreign lands under similar circumstances you must pay this claim.

Mr. NORTHWAY. We presumed that the State Department, which had investigated all the evidence in the case, knew something, and when they found the fact to be that these people were British subjects we were concluded by that finding, and it is not true that we are bound to investigate everything in detail. When the head of a Department comes to us with a statement and recommends an appropriation, we have a right to take something for granted.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly. There is not a scintilla of evidence that these people were not British subjects, and therefore, as my friend from Ohio has said, we were shut up to the conclusion that the case was as it was presented to us by the State Department.

Mr. HITT. My colleague from Illinois asked a question which the committee did not ask as to these British subjects and their intentions, because we will not suffer any foreign government to ask such a question in the case of a like claim by an American. When an American who had lived eighteen years in a country was hurt in an altercation, a ship of ours threatened to bombard the town if $19,000 was not paid because this man had had his head broken in a row, and we did not permit any Chinese functionary to ask what were the intentions of that American as to permanent or temporary residence.

Mr. MERCER. How much money has this Government exacted of the Chinese Government on account of the missionary riots last summer?

Mr. HITT. Well, we have not collected all—

Mr. MERCER. It seems to take about thirty years to collect 30 cents.

Mr. HITT. But we have collected so much money from China and from other governments on such claims for indemnity that it does not lie in our mouths to ask the question whether a foreigner within our borders is here for a short time or a long time. We never permit that question to be asked as to an American in a foreign country.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to say to my colleague [Mr. HITT] before he takes his seat that his Chinese illustration has no bearing upon the point I am making. Nobody would suppose that an American citizen would want to lose the rights belonging to him as such and become a subject of the Chinese Empire. But we do know that British subjects come here by the thousands every year, and while some become American citizens, we know that many remain here year after year enjoying the splendid privileges that are accorded to American citizens, while they still cling to the rights of British subjects, so that in an emergency they may have other and different rights from those accorded to the people with whom they associate.

Mr. HITT. American citizens do the same thing in other countries.

Mr. HOPKINS. Never in the world. The gentleman can not cite an instance.

Mr. HITT. We have such cases arising all the time. I could refer particularly to cases in France, in Peru, in Colombia, and other foreign countries.

Mr. TUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is not entitled to the floor.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I see that the pending bill proposes to appropriate something like $15,000, to be paid to foreign governments on account of injuries or wrongs supposed to have been suffered by subjects of those governments in the United States. Here, for instance, is an appropriation of $10,000 to the Italian Government, nearly $4,000 to the Government of Great Britain, and $2,000 to the German Government. Now, I do not pretend to say that these are not just claims and that they ought not to be paid, for it is probable they may be just and right. I do not assert that these injuries and losses should not be indemnified if the damages have actually been sustained by the different parties mentioned. But I want to remind the House that while we are thus willingly appropriating these large sums for the relief of foreign citizens or subjects, we on last Friday occupied the whole day in the discussion of an appropriation amounting, I believe, to only $1,000 to pay to a citizen of the United States a debt which was a perfectly just obligation of the Government, which had been so adjudged by the Court of Claims of the United States. It costs us $25,000 or $30,000 a year to maintain that court; yet we sit here day after day and refuse to pay to citizens of the United States the amounts which that tribunal finds honestly and justly due for ravages committed during the war. Ought we not to pay the debts the Government owes to her own citizens as well as others?

I say, Mr. Chairman, that while we are doing justice to these foreigners we should not forget that charity, if charity you call it, ought to begin at home. We should not neglect to do justice to the thousands of American citizens in this country who have for years been awaiting reimbursement for their property which the Government took from them under the guise of the rights of rigid warfare. Indeed, sir, it would seem almost a matter of practical impossibility to get one dollar appropriated to citizens of the United States on claims honestly due and which the Court of Claims has said ought to be paid, and in some cases where the money is locked up already in the United States Treasury.

Sir, this is a piece of injustice toward our own citizens of which we should not be guilty. We should act honestly toward our own citizens; we should pay them what is justly due them; we should carry out the rule that charity begins at home, even if it should afterwards go abroad. If we want to extend our generosity or justice to citizens of other countries, let us not forget at the same time to do justice to our own citizens. Let us be just and honest toward our own people before we are so generous to foreigners.

Sir, I know citizens of my own State to whom the Government is justly indebted, and who are suffering to-day for the want of the money which the Government owes them. Some of those claims may not yet have been reported upon, but they are honestly due; but in the case of the claim of which I spoke, which was under discussion the whole of last Friday, the right of the claimant had been established in the Court of Claims. Now, I say, unless we intend to pay such claims, let us abolish that court at once; let us declare in plain terms that we repudiate our just debts; let us put up or shut up; let us do right in these matters.

I do not say that the appropriations now before this Committee of the Whole for the benefit of foreign subjects ought not to be paid; possibly they ought to be. If they are just and right let them be paid; but while we are taking care of foreigners, while we are taking care of negroes, while we are taking care of Indians, let us try and take care of the poor white people of our own country who have just claims against us, for it is the poor people who are in the majority. It seems to me, sir, that God must love the poor people more than anybody else, because he has made so many more of them. Let us do something for this class of people in our own country. I have introduced a bill which only asked for the right to draw money from the Treasury already there for citizens of my own State, and the bill has not even been reported, either favorably or unfavorably. If we pay one, let us pay all; if we refuse to pay one party, let us refuse to pay all. "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none" should be our motto in this as in all other matters.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee for a very few moments, I think I can state in brief terms the substantial facts with reference to this matter, which I have taken some pains to investigate carefully, as disclosed by the papers filed with our committee.

It is there shown that these people, Dawson, his wife, and daughter, and a gentleman who was with them at the time, now his son-in-law, were passing through our State and had reached Sarpy County, on the eastern border of the State. They had camped by the roadside—

Mr. KEM. Will my colleague state when this was?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. About eighteen months ago.

They had camped by the roadside, when a gang known as the McCarty's, who have since, but for another offense, been sentenced to the penitentiary, passed, very much in liquor. They inquired of the now son-in-law if it was a "show" encamped there. The young man to whom I have referred replied that if they wouldn't get out he would "show" them. This answer, it seems, provoked a fight. The women subsequently interfered, and the whole party were severely handled by the McCarty's, the women as well as the men being badly bruised, and their effects destroyed or at least injured. The amount in this bill, doubtless, fully covers all the damage, including that to their feelings.

Now, these facts seem established: These parties were itinerants, passing through the country, going to the northwestern part of the State for the purpose, it appears, of taking up land in that region. After they had been engaged in the fight, as I have already briefly described, they remained a week or ten days in that locality, in the vicinity of the McCarty's, and partly as their guests—at least cared for by them. The McCarty's were arrested; but the Dawsons, either through fear or for some other reason satisfactory to themselves, declined to appear against them; and while the courts of the State, both civil and criminal, were open to them, certain it is that no action was ever taken by them against their assailants. The fact remains, however, that they were British subjects temporarily sojourning in the State, were severely injured by their assailants, and have a claim against the people of this country for the injuries thus received.

Now, the point I wish to make is this: Our people under all such circumstances demand recompense from foreign countries and foreign people wherever our citizens have been unjustly treated. We have a right to insist upon a satisfactory settlement when the humblest citizen of our land is set upon without just cause in a foreign land. When a question of fact arises we resolve it, as we should, in favor of our people. But, Mr. Chairman, we would have no standing whatever with foreign countries unless we are ourselves generous and fair in the treatment of those who come here—the citizens of other foreign countries—and who have like claims against our people. If, therefore, we expect to defend our citizens abroad, we must extend to those people who are temporarily in our States the same measure of protection that we demand for our own people; and we must, wherever a question of fact is raised, give to them the benefit of the doubt if we expect to claim the same benefit on the part of our people in foreign lands.

Now, summing it all up, it is conceded that these people were temporarily in our borders, that they were severely handled, that they have a right to demand recompense, that the State authorities recommend that they be recompensed for the injuries received, that the State Department joins in this recommendation, and the Committee on Appropriations, having carefully investigated the subject, report favorably the provision embodied in this bill. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that Congress ought not to cavil for a single moment over the money.

Mr. KIEFER. Were the McCarty's themselves not also British subjects?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I think not. I do not know, however. At present, as I understand, they are incarcerated in the State penitentiary.

Mr. KIEFER. If they were British subjects, what would be the effect so far as the liabilities of the United States in this case are concerned?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That I do not concede. I do not care, however, to discuss a question which is not before us.

Mr. KEM. I would like to ask my colleague one or two questions.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. KEM. I understand that these people, at the time the outrage was committed upon them, were on their way to northwestern Nebraska to take up lands?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEM. Then, evidently, it was their intention to become American citizens?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Not necessarily; our State laws permit them to take property without being citizens.

Mr. KEM. Does the gentleman know whether they have since become citizens?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I do not know. There is nothing in the record to show it. They are now about Alliance, in the northwestern part of the State.

Mr. HOPKINS. I suppose there is no doubt among the members of the House on the proposition that this Government should always respond to a fair and just request of a foreign government for indemnity for injuries done to subjects of such government in this country. It was not to controvert that principle at all that I arose from my seat and propounded the question to my colleague when this matter first came up; but I think that when these appropriations are made and the members of the House are called upon to pass upon them, the committee should be prepared with facts and circumstances sufficient to enlighten the members so that they can vote intelligently upon the subject.

Now, as I said before, to my mind it makes a great deal of difference whether the case is one of a foreigner temporarily within our borders or whether it is a person who has lived here for a great many years. The statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] has cleared up that doubt in my mind. He has shown clearly from his knowledge of the affair that these parties were only temporarily here and that they were set upon by ruffians whom the authorities have since sent to the penitentiary. Under such conditions I shall withdraw any opposition to the appropriation. Let the pro forma amendment be withdrawn.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Recoinage, reissue, and transportation of minor coins: The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to transfer to the United States mint at Philadelphia, for cleaning and reissue, any minor coins now in, or which may be hereafter received at, the subtreasury offices in excess of the requirement for the current business of said offices; and the sum of $2,000 is hereby appropriated for the expense of transportation for such reissue. And the Secretary of the Treasury is also authorized to recoin any and all the uncurrent minor coins now in the Treasury.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing and directing the President to invite the commercial nations of the world to join in an international monetary conference.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to invite the commercial nations of the world to join in an international monetary conference, to be held at as early a date as practicable, for the purpose of establishing an international standard of ratio between gold and silver as money; and for this purpose a commission consisting of nine delegates shall be selected to represent the United States in such conference, three of which delegates shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives from among the members thereof, three by the Senate from among the Senators, and three by the President of the United States.

And further, For the compensation of said delegates, together with all reasonable expenses incurred by the holding of the conference, to be approved by the Secretary of State, including the proportion to be paid by the United States of the joint expenses of the conference, the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Delaware desires to be heard I do not desire to cut him off from a five-minute speech. I will reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be reserved.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering that amendment is to get that subject before the House. If it shall be ruled out of order as not germane, why, then, I shall ask to have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I think that after all that has been said and all that has been done, and in view of the peculiar attitude that we occupy as a party to this great question of finance and currency, it is as little as we can do to urge what is indicated in that joint resolution.

Mr. CANNON. As we have had legislation substantially of that kind upon the statute books for two years and over and it is not yet executed—and, so far as I know, not an effort has been made toward it—it seems to me under existing conditions that it is useless to take up time in this discussion, and therefore I will have to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. There is a statute upon the books that authorizes and directs the President to appoint this commission whenever provision shall have been made or invitation given by any foreign government; but this is a joint resolution authorizing and directing the President to make the invitation, to take the initiative.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. My point of order is that this is not germane; and it can be seen at once that under existing conditions if we enter upon this discussion we are liable to have the dog days upon us before we finish it. I have no objection to the appointment of the commission.

Mr. SAYERS. There is no question pending before the committee. The Chair has sustained the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sustained the point of order. There is nothing before the committee.

Mr. CANNON. I did not understand that the Chair had sustained the point of order.

Mr. WILLIS. Would it be in order for me to have this resolution referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The CHAIRMAN. Not in Committee of the Whole. It can be done in the House.

Mr. WILLIS. I will make the proposition in the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. COUSINS having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions and a bill of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 160) to appoint four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 163) to amend the act approved August 1, 1894, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, etc.; and

A bill (H. R. 365) to fix the date of the discharge of Thomas Johnson.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 3549) authorizing the Aransas Harbor Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Corpus Christi Channel, known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Channel, in Aransas County, Tex.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 2848) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895," approved August 18, 1894; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Customs service: To defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, being additional to the permanent appropriations for this purpose, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, $350,000.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word, and may desire ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that he may have ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is an appropriation recommended by the committee of $850,000 to cover a deficiency in the collection of customs revenues. I will call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is a permanent appropriation for the collection of customs revenues of $5,500,000 per annum. In addition to that, the law appropriates certain miscellaneous receipts, which, when they come into the Treasury in connection with customs collections, become available for the service. Now, then, we do not recommend anywhere near the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury as necessary for this purpose; and it is so important a matter that we feel that it ought not to be passed over without the committee being in full possession, briefly stated, of the facts; so that if they see proper to increase this appropriation, they should have an opportunity to do so, or, if it is sufficient, that they should have such information as would justify the committee in standing by the recommendation.

Now, then, there have been some extraordinary increases in the expenses of the current year; and if you will bear with me a minute I will show the amount of revenue collected since 1893 to the present time and the cost of collecting the same.

In 1892 the revenues collected from customs were $177,452,964.15, and the expense of collections was $6,594,662.91.

In 1893, from customs, there was $205,000,000 of revenue collected, the cost of collecting which was $6,756,000.

The next year, 1894, there was $181,000,000 collected, which was a falling off of $73,000,000. The cost of collecting was $6,841,000. In round numbers it cost in 1894 $100,000 more to collect the revenue than it did in 1893, although the amount collected in 1893 was seventy-odd millions more than in 1894.

In 1895 the amount of customs revenue collected was $152,000,000. The expense of collection was $6,896,000; an increase of $50,000 of expense and an increase of $30,000,000 of revenue.

In 1896—that is, the present year—the estimate of customs revenues to be collected by the 1st of July, provided the collections for the next three months hold up as they have for the last nine months, will be $160,000,000. That shows a decrease of some thirty-odd million dollars below what they were in 1893. Now, the expense of collecting these revenues are, if we grant the full estimates, $7,239,000; an increase of $734,520 above 1893 for cost of collection; of $482,000 above 1893 of cost of collection; $397,000 above 1894, and $342,000 above 1895, last year. Now, then—

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman right there state what the estimate of the Secretary is? I do not see it here.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes. The permanent appropriation is $5,500,000, and from miscellaneous receipts $586,000, and then the estimate is $1,150,000 in addition, making in all to the Secretary for the collection of revenues this year, $7,239,000, an increase of $342,000 over last year.

Mr. HOPKINS. How much over the last year of the Republican Administration?

Mr. CANNON. Well, in round numbers, $734,000 over the fiscal year 1893. It is $482,000 over the first year of Cleveland's present Administration.

Now, then, so far as a hasty examination shows the reason for this expenditure, we have the following explanation from the Secretary of the Treasury: At Tampa, Baltimore, Boston, Newport News, Philadelphia, Burlington, Vt., and New York, there is an increase this year, 1896, for clerical force over clerical force of 1895 of 273 people. But that is not all. There is an increase in the salaries of 168 people at these 5 ports. Now, that largely explains the increase. I have not a complete statement, and had not time to get it of the whole 119 collection districts, but we did get it as to these 5, and to me it is a most extraordinary condition of things.

A MEMBER. Is that not additional warehouses?

Mr. CANNON. That fact is, I believe, not a sufficient reason for making arbitrarily an increase of 273 people at these 5 ports, and increasing the salary of 168 others. Now, then, these increases over last year amount in the aggregate, as I stated a moment ago, to $342,000.

Mr. HOPKINS. In salaries?

Mr. CANNON. Most of it in salaries, substantially in salaries, the large part being for increase of force and another large part being increase of the salaries of the force that they had in 1895. That is pretty well up to $300,000 in one department touching the collection of customs. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, we do not recommend the whole amount of the deficiency, $1,150,000; but do recommend $850,000, which is, in round numbers, $50,000 more than the service cost last year; and it was the intention of the committee, if the Committee of the Whole should agree with it, that the Secretary of the Treasury should be compelled, so far as he can be compelled by appropriation, to decrease this force, if it can be decreased, or at least to decrease the salaries of the 163 persons that he has arbitrarily added to the force during this fiscal year. So far as I know there is nothing like this in the action of any Executive Department in the history of the country where the fund is expended under the discretion of the Executive. Why, I recollect that in the Forty-fourth Congress the whole country was absolutely convulsed by the attack that was made upon the salaried list of the employees of the Government. There were hundreds and thousands of pages written, telegraphed, and printed on the subject, and a great political campaign was made upon the question of reduction of salaries; and yet the total reduction of the salaries of Government employees made at that time did not amount to $150,000; while here is an increase of these expenses for salaries at one turn of the crank of $300,000 in round numbers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CANNON's time was extended for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not speak of these things, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of attacking anybody. This is a great service in a great Department of a great Government. Every dollar that is required for the honest and economical conduct of the public service should be granted, and nobody will go further than I will to vote it; but it did seem to me and it does seem to me that this is an extraordinary condition of affairs when we compare this expenditure, not with that under any Republican Administration, but with the expenditure under this same Democratic Administration for the fiscal years 1893, 1894, 1895, and so much of 1896 as has elapsed; and I am glad to say that, so far as I am informed, the members of the Committee on Appropriations at both ends of the table were unanimous in recommending that the full deficiency should not be given and in recommending only $850,000. It may be that as the years roll round it requires more money to collect less revenue. It may be that the ad valorem system affords greater opportunities for fraud, and therefore requires greater vigilance and consequently greater expense than the specific system. I do not know; but I do feel quite certain that if it requires three or four hundred thousand dollars more this year under the ad valorem system than it required last year, they must have had last year a very lax administration of the law.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I have made the explanation that I desired to make to the Committee of the Whole about this item.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this item I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk a telegram just received from the chief of the warrant division of the Treasury respecting expenditures for collection of customs revenue.

The telegram was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 20, 1896.

TO J. C. COURTS:

The expenditures on account of collecting revenue from customs for first six months of present fiscal year were $3,604,771. The expenditures are not separated so as to show how much are chargeable to the permanent appropriation and how much to the fees collected. It has always been treated as one account.

W. F. MACLENNAN.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, before we go on with this item I would like to hear from our Democratic friends some explanation of this remarkable increase in the number of employees in this service and also of the increase of salaries. My colleague [Mr. CANNON] has laid before the committee a most extraordinary statement of what would seem to be profligate expenditure on the part of the Treasury Department. If any explanation can be made to the members of this Committee of the Whole and to the country I would like to have it made now.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I am under any obligations to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. He is not running this House, and I would suggest to him that if he desires information about this matter he should call upon the Secretary of the Treasury for it. I do not profess to have all the information that is necessary to explain in detail every act of every officer in the administrative branch of the Government. There may be good reasons why this increase has been made, but I do not know them. The gentleman ought to be possessed of the information himself. He is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and he should have taken steps to inquire into the methods employed for the collection of customs duties during the past six months. That is the business of the gentleman from Illinois as a prominent member of the Committee on Ways and Means as well as of this House. I am informed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HALNER] that most of this increase is due to new warehouses that have been constructed under the authority of Congress.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, the courtesy of the gentleman from Texas is fully equal to the amount of information he has given to the committee on this subject.

Mr. SAYERS. I did not intend to give any information. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I supposed so, and that is the reason I say that the gentleman's courtesy is equal to the amount of information that he has conveyed to the members of this committee. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, the reason I called upon the gentleman, or upon some gentleman of his political faith, for an explanation of this matter is that the gentleman from Texas is especially charged, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, with the duty of laying before the House the information upon which the recommendations of that committee are made.

Mr. SAYERS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman from Illinois who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is specially charged with this matter; and I will say that the other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], who is now occupying the floor, can not exempt himself from culpability, if there has been any, in not putting himself in possession of the information necessary to enable the House to understand what is being done.

Mr. HOPKINS. The "gentleman who is now occupying the floor" is attempting to do just what the gentleman from Texas has indicated he should do; he is trying to develop some of the facts upon which this enormous increase in the expense of the service has been made and upon which this increase of salaries has also been made. According to the statement of my colleague [Mr. CANNON], the expense of this service has increased about $500,000 beyond what it was during the last year of the Republican Administration. The evidence also is that the amount of duty we are collecting is less than it was during the last year of the Republican Administration.

Now, the gentlemen on the other side have prided themselves on the fact that they are statesmen representing retrenchment and reform; they believe in cutting down appropriations wherever it can properly be done; they are against increase of clerical force; and they are also, or at least pretend to be, against any increase of salaries of Government employees. The statement is made here to-day that there have been more than one hundred increases—

A MEMBER. One hundred and sixty-eight.

Mr. HOPKINS. One hundred and sixty-eight increases in the clerical force, while, according to the reports, less business is being done than was performed by the force during the last Republican Administration. Not only that, but more than 270 of the members of this clerical force have had their salaries increased.

Now, I see that my friend from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] is interested in this discussion. He is a member of this Committee on Appropriations. I should like to know whether this increase in the salaries of more than 270 members of this force meets with his approval, and also whether this increase to the extent of 168 new members of the clerical force meets with his approval. If not, then I want to know whether he will join with my honored colleague at the head of this committee [Mr. CANNON] in holding these appropriations down to something that is reasonable.

Statistics show that this Democratic party has cost the Government nearly $6,000,000 per month, during every month that Grover Cleveland has occupied the White House, more than the revenues of the Government. Under these conditions it seems to me the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be told in language plain and clear that this House at least will not approve of these extravagant expenditures upon his part or upon the part of any of his subordinates.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, all that I want to say in reply to my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is this: Over perhaps no one section of this bill did we exercise more care, upon no other section probably did we bestow more thought and investigation, than upon the one now under discussion. We believe as a committee—I think I can speak for the whole committee—that this increase in the number of employees and in the amount of salaries and the general increase in the expenditures of that Department ought to be looked into; and we did look into it as best we could. With Mr. Hamlin, one of the assistant secretaries of the Treasury before us, we went through the matter in detail. We found we had to do just one of two things—either to grant the appropriation or at the next session have the Department come in with a large deficit on the deficiency bill.

More than that, I want to say to my friend from Illinois—no doubt he has learned it since he has been in Congress—that this is a "billion-dollar Congress" and it is a "billion-dollar country." [Applause on the Republican side.] You can not get rid of that fact. [Renewed applause.] Our country is growing. The increase in the number of these warehouses has necessarily increased the clerical force. I can not say to the gentleman from Illinois just why some of these salaries have been increased. I take it for granted, as this thing occurs under both Republican and Democratic Administrations and is occurring every day in all Departments of the Government, there are good reasons for these increases; but I do not know what they are.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I find in a table attached to the report of the committee on this bill a statement which induces me to suppose that nine additional warehouses and annexes to warehouses have been established in the port of New York and that a considerable amount of this increased amount is incident thereto. The gentleman of course knows that those are private establishments, that they are entirely in the interest of individuals as to whatever profits may be made out of them. Now, with decreasing importations, why the necessity for this increased number of warehouses with the attendant increase of expenses on the part of the Government? Can the gentleman explain that?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. My friend must remember that while the fees on importations have decreased, yet the number of articles put upon the free list by the last Congress was greatly increased. We put an immense number of articles on the free list, and these must go through the same examination as if they were dutiable.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, no. I beg the gentleman's pardon. No nondutiable goods go into the warehouses at all. It is the imports of dutiable goods that go into the warehouses, and this volume is decreasing and has decreased largely. Therefore, why the necessity for this increase in warehouses?

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to take issue with my friend from Georgia right here. I do not wish what he has said just now to go out as representing the views of every one of the minority. I do not believe Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HEPBURN. Before my friend from Texas goes on I would like to ask what has become of my inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield the floor in a moment. I want to occupy it just now in connection with what the gentleman from Georgia has been saying.

I do not believe the administration of this Government requires the expenditure of a billion of dollars every Congress, and therefore do not agree to the statement of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If my colleague will allow me, I made no such statement.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman said this was a billion-dollar Congress and a billion-dollar country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; but I said in the investigation of the matter we concluded that the matters presented by the Department must be met, not that we approved of them or said it was not too large or too great an increase.

Mr. SAYERS. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to say that this is a billion-dollar Congress and a billion-dollar country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, I am not going back on that proposition, if you want to discuss it.

Mr. SAYERS. I am one of those, Mr. Chairman, who do not believe that in order that the public affairs of this country may be properly administered it will require the expenditure of a billion of dollars for each Congress. I believe the expenditures for the administration of the Government are already too large, and that they should be decreased, not increased, and that they could be decreased without any injury to the public service. That is my judgment; and what I say applies to all Administrations, whether they be Democratic or Republican. I think we are spending too much money in administering the public affairs. And I am not willing for my Republican friends to believe that I for one sanction the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia, and what is implied in the statement, that this is necessarily a billion-dollar Congress and a billion-dollar country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I was making my statement from an entirely nonpartisan standpoint. I do not think politics ought to enter into these questions. I do not propose to lug politics into everything I say on the floor of the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Do not forget my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is your question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I asked you the necessity for the increase in the number of bonded warehouses and the increase in the detail of clerks to them, while there is a constantly decreasing volume of dutiable goods to go into them?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to say now again that the Appropriations Committee went into this matter in detail. While we doubted the propriety of the increase in the number of employees and the salaries of employees, we were met by the officials of the Treasury Department with the positive assertion and their positive figures that they could not do the work with less, and we granted it on their statement and not on our own personal knowledge.

Mr. CANNON. Now, will the gentleman just allow me there?

Mr. HEPBURN. I thought I had a right to get an answer to my inquiry.

Mr. CANNON. I want to keep matters straight as we go on.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. We recommend $850,000; that is to say, $300,000 less than the estimate. So we are trying, in our recommendation, to cure the increase of salaries and the increase of force at least in part.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We suppose that we have been putting the Department on notice that we are not satisfied about that increase of expenditure.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does not the gentleman know that the bonded warehouses are private establishments? The Government does not own them. They are kept by certain persons in their own interest, and they are the sole beneficiaries of them. It is true that the Government sends its officers to watch them, but why have you increased the number by about 33 per cent in New York, when there is such a marked decrease in dutiable goods? That is what I want to know, and I hope the gentleman will take time to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to strike out the last word. I desire to have the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], who protests that this is not a billion-dollar country, and that appropriations should not be made that would aggregate a billion of dollars for the purpose of carrying on the Government.

Now, I find by an examination of the record that the revenues collected from customs in 1892 aggregated $191,988,887. Under a Republican Administration, with Republican officials to collect this vast sum of money, it only cost the Government $6,504,662. But when this party of economy and reform came in, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] were placed in power in the House to control the expenditures of the Government, I find that in the present year, while there was only collected the sum of $169,288,399 from customs revenues, the Department insists that it has cost $7,239,183.52 to make the collections, which is just $734,520 more than it required to collect the $191,000,000 during the last year of Republican Administration. Here is a splendid example, Mr. Chairman, of the manner in which the Democratic party, under the leadership of my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and his colleague from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] conducted the affairs of this Government. These are the men who are constantly prating to the members of this committee that they are standing like a stone wall between the members of the House and the Treasury.

Now, I want to know from the gentleman from Texas, and also the gentleman from Missouri, why it is that in this bill that is before us to-day they vote the Treasury Department $434,520 more money for collecting $169,000,000 than was required under a Republican Administration to collect the larger sum that I have mentioned? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] says that they are cutting this down, and yet he comes in and favors a bill that gives the Treasury Department this vast sum of $434,000 more than was ever received by a Republican Administration. Now, if the gentleman has any explanation, I should like to have him rise in his place and give it. If he has not, then I for one want him to stop prating about economy. I want him to stop parading the Democratic party before the members of this committee as a party of retrenchment and reform. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the first thing I would do would be to advise the gentleman to very carefully revise his remarks before he puts them in the RECORD, because I do not think he or his friends who have applauded him will stand by all that he has just said. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not heard me say a word during this Congress about the comparative merits or demerits of the Republican and Democratic parties in the matter of appropriations and expenditures. I challenge him to examine the RECORD and show, if he can, a single word from me that will sustain what he has said in reference to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and myself in this particular.

But I will call the attention of the committee to one fact. The Congress of the United States has not sought to control the expenditures for the collection of customs. In the first place, a permanent appropriation of $5,500,000 was made many years ago, which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use in his discretion for the purpose of collecting customs dues. In addition to that sum the Secretary of the Treasury has been authorized to use various fees accruing in the shape of miscellaneous receipts, which in 1871 amounted to $1,366,890.47. But those fees through the operations of laws—

Mr. GROUT. Of the Wilson law.

Mr. SAYERS. No; not the Wilson law. If the gentleman will read the testimony given before the subcommittee on the deficiency bill he will find that three laws which were enacted long before the Wilson bill are the laws which principally caused the reduction. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has the testimony of Mr. Hamlin, showing what the three laws were which have reduced this amount from $1,366,890.47, which it was in 1871, to $640,986 in 1895.

The gentleman will see that this has been reduced more than one-half. Now, from year to year, in order to supply the deficiency, the Secretary of the Treasury has been compelled to ask Congress to make up the deficit by such an appropriation as is now under consideration.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], who I believe has been a member of the Committee on Ways and Means for two Congresses, should be absolutely familiar not only with the amount of duties which are paid, but with the cost of collecting those duties. All the information that the Appropriations Committee have had upon the subject is what has been read by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Now, I do not approve any more than does anyone else these increases of salaries. I have uniformly voted against them. I stand by my vote to-day, as I have stood ever since I have been a member of Congress, voting for only $850,000 as against an appropriation of $1,150,000. Whether my course has been right or wrong, it has at least been consistent; and before Congress shall have adjourned I will have, I will not say the pleasure, the opportunity of calling the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished gentleman who represents the Aurora district [Mr. HOPKINS], to the fact that the appropriations made by a Republican House largely exceed those which were made when the Democrats were in control. The gentleman in the course of his remarks seems to hold me responsible for the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in the matter of this increase. I submit to the gentleman that if his criticism in other matters is not more just and not better founded than his criticism of myself for this increase of the customs force, that it ought not to be appreciated, even by himself, after deliberate reflection.

Mr. HOPKINS. You repudiate the action of the Department, do you?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not.

Mr. HOPKINS. You wash your hands of it?

Mr. SAYERS. I know nothing about it. I do not repudiate it.

Mr. CANNON. If my colleague on the committee will allow me, I have only to state that I said, or at least I intended to say, and if I did not, I desire now to say, that I know the Committee on Appropriations are unanimous at both ends of the table and in the center in recommending $850,000 for this deficiency, which is $300,000 less than the estimate made by the Secretary.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly; there is no question as to that.

Mr. HOPKINS. Right there, before my colleague sits down—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to strike out the last word. That $300,000 is $432,520 more than was expended in the last Republican Administration, is it not?

Mr. CANNON. For the year 1892—

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct, but—

Mr. HOPKINS. And that these figures—

Mr. SAYERS. Let the gentleman answer.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to my friend that I do not feel justified in cutting the amount down to what it cost to collect the revenues in 1892, while the collections were much larger in 1892 than they will be this year or were last year; but yet we did not have sufficient knowledge to be able to say that it does not cost more to collect the customs on an ad valorem principle than it does on a specific; and we do not know, perhaps, but what a part of this increase might be explained from the fact that maybe it was necessary to exercise very great diligence against undervaluation in the importations.

Mr. HOPKINS. If there is a change from the specific to the ad valorem system of customs duties, that change was brought about by the repeal of the Republican law of 1890 and the substitution for it of the Wilson-Gorman bill, so called.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I understand, the gentleman knows, and the country knows what the history of legislation is. I am not now here to say that it cost more to collect under the ad valorem than under a specific tariff bill. Possibly that may be so. But let me say that under these appropriations, as we recommend them, it costs this year, with $30,000,000 less of revenue, $424,000 more of expenditure than in 1892, whatever the cause may be; and for fear that the service may possibly be crippled, we did not see proper to withhold that $424,000 in our recommendation.

Mr. GROUT was recognized.

Mr. SAYERS rose.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman wants to ask a question I will yield for a moment.

Mr. SAYERS. My friend from the Aurora district will please stand up. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly. I will be delighted to be interrogated by the gentleman.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman addresses his colleague from Illinois—the gentleman in charge of this bill—and refers to the repeal of what he terms the Republican customs law.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman also tell the committee whether or not he would reenact that customs law, carrying with it the sugar bounty, amounting to between $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 in its last payment?

Mr. HOPKINS. As compared with the present law, I would vote for it a thousand to one. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SAYERS. But will you vote for that bill, not as compared with any other?

Mr. HOPKINS. If we find that by the experience of the last few years we can improve upon that bill, when we send forth a general tariff we will put those improvements in; but I will say to the gentleman that if we do not, we will reenact that law as it is now, for it is infinitely better than anything that could be had from the present Democratic party. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. I suppose the gentleman speaks for the various candidates for the Presidency. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not happen to be a manager of any of the candidates. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] stated that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] should revise his remarks before they are printed. I say the same as to one item, and that he should revise and make the figures still more telling against the Democracy.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course.

Mr. GROUT. Precisely; because the figures justify that remark.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman tell us how?

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman from Illinois said that the amount expended in collecting the revenue in 1892 was six millions and some odd hundred thousand dollars. It was a little less than $6,000,000. The annual appropriation for such purpose was $5,500,000, but the deficiency appropriation for that year was $450,000, making the total amount $5,950,000.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me? He means that he shall revise to that extent and make the bill still higher.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, the gentleman will have to revise his figures. I will not use the expression that the gentleman is "talking through his hat," but he is certainly groping in the dark. If the gentleman will turn to page 10 of the hearings before the subcommittee on deficiencies he will find a communication from the chief of the division of bookkeeping and warrants. That is the best authority that I know of—even better than that of the gentleman from Vermont, distinguished statistician as he is. This authority puts the expenditures at $6,000,000 in 1892 and $6,607,507.39 in 1893.

Mr. GROUT. Yes, but that includes these incidental expenses which by operation of law are appropriated. I am talking of the deficiency which came in here. Presumably the miscellaneous collections were about the same, but the deficiency that we were asked to make up in 1892 in the appropriation bill was only $450,000.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman says he presumes that the miscellaneous receipts were about the same. If he will turn to page 10 of the hearings he will find that since 1892 they have decreased more than $120,000.

Mr. GROUT. They have decreased, and I was going to call attention to that in this very connection. The gentleman says that by operation of law these miscellaneous expenditures have been gradually decreasing. It seems that they have. He stated that in 1891 they were over a million, but in 1895 they were only $640,000. That is correct. But let us look between these dates. In 1889 they were $1,000,000 and over; in 1891 they were $966,000 and over; in 1892 they were $909,000 and over; in 1893 they were $906,000. But after the Wilson bill took effect, as I said to the gentleman from Texas by way of interruption, they dropped from that figure down to $882,000 in 1894 and to $640,000 in 1895, the greater fall having taken place since the Wilson bill went into effect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to go back to the other point: I say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] may revise his figures, and say that the cost of collecting the revenue, aside from these miscellaneous items appropriated by operation of law, was less than $6,000,000 in 1892.

Let us follow up the history of these figures and see what it shows. In 1893, when the Democrats came in and managed the business for that fiscal year under the McKinley law from March to July, what was the deficiency appropriation? It was $500,000. There was an increase of $50,000 under a Democratic Administration of precisely the same law for only five months. In 1894, which was, of course, wholly under Democratic rule, but under the McKinley law, because the Wilson Act did not take effect until August, 1894, as I remember, there was a further increase to $685,000. That was under a Democratic Administration of precisely the same law, the McKinley law. Whereas, as I said before, in 1892 the deficiency was only $450,000, in 1891 it was only $500,000, and 1890 it was only $435,000. Here we see an increase from $450,000, the amount appropriated under the last full year of Republican Administration of the McKinley law, to $685,000, the only full year of Democratic Administration of the same law. In other words, it cost the Democratic party $235,000 more to collect the customs revenue for a year than it did the Republican party. But that is not all. In 1895, when the Wilson bill was in operation, the deficiency straightway jumped to $770,000. That was the first full year of the Wilson bill, to wit, the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

Now, we have the enormous estimate sent to the Committee on Appropriations by the Secretary of the Treasury of $1,150,000 of deficiency for this purpose for the current year. That estimate, as the chairman of the committee has well said, startled the committee, and they saw fit to put a limitation upon the Secretary of the Treasury in what seemed to them this extravagant administration of the law, resulting in an increase at the port of New York alone of 120 men. That was the increase in the force at New York alone, and the salaries of 15 other men were also increased.

Mr. AEBOLD of Rhode Island. One hundred and seventy.

Mr. GROUT. That is the total number. I am speaking of the port of New York alone. But on examination I find the gentleman from Rhode Island is right. There is an increase of 170 men at the port of New York alone, and who believes this increase necessary?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman from Illinois, in charge of this bill, says that the committee were united in limiting this deficiency appropriation to $850,000, but let members keep in mind that that does not limit the Secretary of the Treasury to that expenditure. He may go right on and expend his $1,150,000 and send in an estimate for a deficiency next winter, and we must go forward and appropriate the money. I say there should be a limitation put upon the Secretary in this expenditure, and the only way to limit him in it is by an express provision of law attached to this appropriation saying that he shall not exceed this amount. That is really the only way to do it. He may, without regard to this appropriation, go on and employ additional force even beyond what he has employed, thus creating a deficiency even beyond what he has estimated for if he chooses.

Under the law he has full authority in the premises to do that, and all we have to do is to settle the bills. The particular thing, however, which is noteworthy is that in 1892, the last year that the collection of the customs revenue was entirely under the control of the Republican party—that extravagant party which the Democrats have told us about—it cost the people of this country $400,000 less than to collect the revenue for the current year as by this bill appropriated, and cost almost $700,000 less than the Secretary of the Treasury says it will cost for the current year; and it will undoubtedly ultimately cost up to his estimate, viz, $1,150,000, and this is a fair sample of economical Democratic administration. In other words, here is an increase of about $700,000 in collecting about $70,000,000 less revenue than under the last year of Republican administration of the McKinley law; and this is a fair sample of Democratic tariff reform—$700,000 additional expense and $70,000,000 less revenue, and the Government selling bonds to meet current expenses. Who can defend such administration as this?

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not occupy any great length of time in the discussion of the pending paragraph. I regret that my nonpartisan friend from the Aurora district of Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], in his newborn zeal for economy and retrenchment, should have precipitated this debate. I had hoped that this measure would pass without eliciting any partisan discussion, the bill itself having received nonpartisan consideration by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, the unjust and unexpected decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, declaring the income tax to be unconstitutional, has deprived the Government of not less than $30,000,000 of revenue annually and resulted in a deficiency in the Federal revenues; that is to say, the expenditures of the Government have exceeded its income. Now, then, confronted with this situation, the Democratic minority on the Appropriations Committee have heartily cooperated with the Republican majority in endeavoring to limit the appropriations to the lowest possible amount consistent with the inexorable demands of the public service. I do not think there has been any division along political lines in the consideration of appropriation bills. We have sustained the chairman of this committee whenever he has pursued this policy, because that seemed to be the requirement of patriotism and sound business judgment.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that in the pursuit of this laudable purpose we have not at all times enjoyed the efficient aid and counsel of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. I recall that only very recently his clarion voice was uplifted in favor of increasing the salaries of five Indian inspectors. I refer to this "more in sorrow than in anger." I remember also that one short week ago his eloquent and persuasive argument was heard in this Hall in behalf of a river and harbor bill carrying liabilities of $62,148,770.91. I mourned on that occasion as one who would not be comforted because my economical friend from Illinois participated in that ruthless assault upon the public Treasury.

But this morning, on a bill unanimously reported by the Committee on Appropriations, we are ambushed by a partisan assault from the other side, led by my eminent friend from Illinois. What is the occasion of this attack? There is no difference of opinion as to the item. The Treasury Department estimate called for $1,150,000. The committee reviewed that estimate and reduced it to $850,000. Why? Because the committee, in the exercise of its best judgment, thought the very large increase of force unnecessary. It is also beyond cavil—I care not who made the estimate—that these extraordinary increases of salaries should not be made in times of widespread industrial depression. So, Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee having in charge this appropriation bill reached the conclusion without dissent that the estimate exceeded the requirements of the public service. Possibly they did not have all the information that could have been obtained; but with the information at hand this was the unanimous finding of the subcommittee without regard to party lines.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Did the committee take any action which would require the Secretary of the Treasury to diminish these expenses?

Mr. DOCKERY. I was not a member of the subcommittee having this bill in charge, and I am not therefore entirely familiar with the facts upon which each item of the bill rests. I was speaking only on the general question.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman from Missouri will permit, I will answer the question of the gentleman from New Hampshire. For two reasons the committee took no such action as he indicates. One reason was that any attempted legislation on this bill would be in violation of the rules of this House and would be subject to a point of order. The other reason was that it would be clearly unwise for Congress to undertake to determine how much the Secretary of the Treasury should expend in the collection of the customs and to limit him to any specified amount.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] be extended for ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, with the consent of the gentleman from Missouri, I will conclude my answer to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER].

There is no business man in this House—I do not care what his political affiliations may be—who will rise in his seat and say that he believes that this Government in the collection of customs duties, or even in the collection of excise duties, upon both of which the Government must depend for its maintenance, should be limited to an exact sum. These officers must be invested to some extent with discretionary power. I repeat, it would be exceedingly unwise for Congress to undertake to limit the expenditures for the collection of the revenues of the Government. I am willing to stand upon those two propositions.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire rose.

Mr. DOCKERY. I prefer not to yield further.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will ask to be recognized in my own right in order to answer the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. DOCKERY. I prefer that the gentleman take that course, as my time is limited.

Mr. Chairman, let me refer a moment to the appropriations made at the first session of the last Congress—a Congress which was Democratic in both branches and for whose action in respect to expenditures we accept full responsibility. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] seems to think that in this Congress the responsibility rests on the minority. I beg to say that the country will not so hold. With 150 Republican majority, whatever is done by this House, wise or unwise, the responsibility therefor properly belongs to the Republican party.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois let me say that in the last Congress, with a Democratic majority on this floor, the total appropriations at the first session amounted to $497,008,520. We were in the majority then, and assume the full responsibility for those appropriations, and our friends on the other side of the aisle, now constituting the Republican majority, must likewise assume the responsibility for the appropriations of this Congress. The appropriation bills of this Congress, as they have already passed the House, amount to $505,079,410.85, exclusive of contracts authorized, which may reach $65,000,000.

And, Mr. Chairman, let me say in passing that a good deal has been said in this debate about the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill by gentlemen on the other side of the House. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], in his own time, tell the country what efforts have been made in this House, with its 150 Republican majority, to repeal that law, so odious, as they claim? It may be that the purpose of the gentleman from Illinois in assailing the Democratic minority, which is powerless here, is to divert attention from the record of the Republican majority made at this session. I remember, Mr. Chairman, that in the campaign of 1894 no more effective campaign document was circulated by the Republican party than the little book of blank leaves, on the title page of which appeared the words: "What Congress has done." That little campaign document was circulated all over the Union by the Republican party.

Mr. Chairman, with the do-nothing record of this Congress I suggest that this document can be again employed to good advantage. That little book of blank leaves in the coming campaign will tell the story of the incapacity of this Republican Congress. What have you done? What law has this Congress enacted to bridge the chasm between inadequate revenues and increasing expenditures? Where is the so-called Dingley bill, framed by the distinguished gentleman from Maine? It rests now in a pigeonhole in the Senate of the United States, consigned to its last resting place by the votes of five Republican Senators who positively refused to even honor it with consideration.

Mr. BRUMM. And how many Democratic Senators helped to put it there?

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, of course every Democratic Senator voted against the bill, because it increased taxation to the amount of more than $40,000,000 annually, and that, too, on the reviled "horizontal" plan about which we heard so much and such bitter denunciation in former years.

Gentlemen, you have not dared to meet untoward conditions with the courage that formerly characterized the Republican party. And why? Because you do not desire to develop to the public gaze on the eve of a Presidential contest the divisions in your own ranks. Mr. Chairman, the Republican party of Lincoln in the old days, with 150 Republican majority on this floor face to face with inadequate revenues and the necessity of increasing them, believing in protection as they did and as you do, would have brought in without delay a general bill revising the tariff to increase the revenues to meet the demands of the Government. But what have you done? You have run away from a tariff bill because you sought to avoid the disclosure of your own differences. You have turned down the Banking and Currency Committee. That great committee is not permitted to perform its proper functions. Charged with the high duty of revising the currency system of the country, it is denied by the leaders of the Republican majority the privileges which it enjoyed during the last Congress. Up to this moment that committee has not called up for consideration a single bill to revise the currency system, although the business interests of the country are intimidated and suffering from ocean to ocean. The policy of the administration of this House seems to be one of delay only, in pursuance of the announcement made by the distinguished Speaker at the beginning of the session. He claimed then against "crude and hasty legislation," language, interpreted by the action of this Congress, which means no legislation until after the November election.

About the only legislation this House has attempted was the passage of the bill indorsing the action of the President in respect to the issue of bonds and granting him "additional" authority under the Dingley bond bill.

I do not believe in thus closing the chasm between income and liabilities. I am opposed to the increase of the interest-bearing debt of the United States in a time of profound peace. I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the issue of bonds to secure gold for the redemption of greenbacks and Sherman notes when there is silver available for that purpose in the National Treasury, clothed with full legal-tender powers, and in all respects the equal partner with gold in meeting the obligations of the Government. Since the Forty-eighth Congress I have over and over again voted for the free coinage of silver at the old tried ratio of "16 to 1." The restoration of silver to its ancient equality with gold during eighty years of our history would obviate the necessity for further bond issues. The Dingley bond bill and the Dingley "horizontal" tariff bill constitute the only attempted relief measures by the House, and in view, therefore, of the utter failure of the Republican party to relieve the suffering industries of the country, I do not wonder that the gentleman from Illinois should seek to divert public attention from the humiliating record of this do-nothing Congress. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad now to see if we can arrive at some conclusion as to the limit of this debate. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], I understand, wants to take a few minutes. Does anybody on the other side wish to be heard?

Mr. SAYERS. I should like to have a few minutes longer for myself.

Mr. CANNON. I would be very glad to close the general debate in twenty-five minutes on this item, or, say, thirty minutes; that all the debate on this proposition and amendments be closed in that time.

Mr. SAYERS. To be equally divided.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] desires fifteen minutes, he tells me, and I should be glad to have unanimous consent to close the debate in an hour.

Mr. SAYERS. That would be entirely satisfactory to me. The debate, however, has been sprung on the committee by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. We were proceeding in a quiet and an orderly way, as the committee always should when considering an appropriation bill, when the gentleman from Illinois—I refer to the gentleman from the Aurora district [laughter], and who is, if anything, a strong political partisan—injects politics into the debate. I appeal, therefore, to my friend—he knows I am not one who seeks or desires to unduly prolong the consideration of appropriation bills—to allow us to conclude the thrashing over this question. I think we ought to have time on this side of the House for the discussion, under the circumstances.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I suggest an hour's time—half of it on that side and half on this side.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman that he let it run a little longer. The House was very kind—

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that, so far as the Committee on Appropriations are concerned, up to this time we have discussed the bill. It seems to me now that half an hour on a side, equally divided, ought to be sufficient on this item.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the gentleman has been very fortunate in getting even thus far without any obstacles, and there is no disposition on this side of the House to interfere with the rapid consideration of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. How much time does the gentleman think we ought to have?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let it run along. I was only stating what I thought was just and fair to the House, and am not disposed to take the time of the House. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], representing this side of the House on this bill, wants to limit the time to ten minutes I shall not complain.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not wish to do that? I only wish to see the consideration of the bill proceed.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman suppose we close it at a quarter to 4 o'clock.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate upon this paragraph be closed at a quarter to 4 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I object.

Mr. CANNON. Then I move that debate on this paragraph be closed at a quarter to 4 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.
Mr. CANNON. The time, of course, is to be equally divided. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine fifteen minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, on the paragraph in the bill which has provoked this debate I have simply this to say: It is inevitable that in all appropriations of this character for the enforcement of certain laws, like those for the collection of the revenues, the judgment of the Department, which is set to enforce the laws, must be accepted. The Department knows the conditions of the various laws relating to the collection of the revenues, the extent of importations, the extent of the efforts to defeat the collection of the revenues, the undervaluation of goods, and everything else that is necessary to form a correct judgment with reference to what is necessary in the administration of these laws. Hence the Committee on Appropriations have done wisely in appropriating, at least approximately, the amount that the Department asks for, placing upon the Department the responsibility for the proper use of that appropriation. It is impossible to pursue any other course with reference to appropriations of this character. Otherwise you would find that the laws providing for the collection of revenue would be defeated and the revenue would fail. It is not in this way that we are to bring to bear upon the Administration such legislation or such direction as may tend directly to promote greater economy.

I am not prepared to say that the Treasury Department has not exercised appropriate economy in the enforcement and collection of the customs revenue, although the necessity for the very large increase of expenditures has not appeared. I am surprised that the amount has increased so largely during the last fiscal year and during the present fiscal year up to this time; and yet I am not surprised from another point of view.

It was inevitable, Mr. Chairman, when the customs law of 1894 was enacted and the specific duties which had prevailed so largely under the act of 1890 were changed so largely to exclusively ad valorem duties—it was inevitable that from that cause alone, if no other, two things would result: First, there would be undervaluation of imports, thereby of itself diminishing the revenue; and, secondly, there would be an increase of expenditures in collecting the same amount of revenue under an ad valorem system over and above any specific system, for this reason: Specific duties are easily administered, and the specific rates provided by the law are easily collected. It requires comparatively a small force to do it. The opportunities for evasion of a specific duty are few. But when duties that were formerly in large part specific were changed to exclusively ad valorem duties, as, for example, in the woolen schedule of the act of 1894, it was inevitable that because of the undervaluation which would follow the revenue would rapidly decrease, and that the force necessary to collect that revenue would be largely increased. When you come to the administration of ad valorem duties, you must have an increased number of appraisers at every point in order to collect any duties at all. And you also have increased importations and less revenue.

Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Manning, in a report to Congress on this subject, said:

Whatever successful contrivances are in operation to-day to evade the revenue by false invoices or by undervaluation or by any other means under an ad valorem system will not cease even if the ad valorem rates shall have been largely reduced. They are incontestably, they are even notoriously, inherent in that system. One advantage, and perhaps the chief advantage, of a specific over an ad valorem system is in the fact that under the former duties are levied by a positive test which can be applied by our officers while the merchandise is in possession of the Government. But under an ad valorem system the facts to which the ad valorem rate is to be applied must be gathered in places many thousand miles away and under circumstances most unfavorable to the administration of justice.

One hears it often said that if our ad valorem rates did not exceed 25 or 30 per cent undervaluation and temptation to undervaluation would disappear. But the records of this Department for the years 1817, 1840, and 1857 do not uphold that conclusion.

James D. Powers, a special agent of the Treasury under Mr. Cleveland, reported:

Ad valorem rates of duty afford temptations and opportunities for fraud which can not be guarded against. Under the ad valorem system fraud has prospered and demoralized the importing trade, which has passed from the hands of American citizens into the control of men who have enriched themselves at the expense of the revenue and the ruin of the trade of American wholesale firms.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will my friend from Maine permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, although my time is short.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman speaks of the increased cost of collection resulting from the method of collecting the taxes. I wish to ask him, is it not a fact that both ad valorem and specific duties were imposed under the law before the Wilson bill was enacted?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly; but the difference in the schedules was this: Under the act of 1890 half of the amount of the duty imposed upon each article under the woolens schedule was specific, and that specific duty was entirely removed by the act of 1894, and nothing but the ad valorem duty was left.

Mr. McMILLIN. But my friend will admit that the collection of 10 cents ad valorem is as great as the collection of 20 cents specific, and that the amount does not change the necessity of the force to collect it?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not admit that at all, for this reason, that the moment every specific duty was removed—for example, on imitations of woolen goods—then undervaluation immediately became a fine art. So long as the duties were half specific they stood in the way of undervaluation, and limited the extent to which it could be done. What has been the result? Under the act of 1890 in 1892 there were imported into this country about $36,000,000 of woolen goods, on which we collected duties to the amount of $34,000,000.

During the last calendar year, ended January 1, 1896, there were imported $60,000,000 of woolen goods, at a lower valuation, and only $27,000,000 of revenue was collected. And unquestionably the true valuation of the $60,000,000 was more than $75,000,000. There is where the mischief comes in. There is where we find the cost of collections runs up and the revenue runs down. The loss of revenue on wool and woolens alone has been at least $20,000,000 and the cost of collecting the smaller amount of revenue has been more than the cost of collecting the larger amount.

Worse than this, you have transferred to Europe the manufacture of more than $30,000,000 of woolen goods, which under the act of 1890 was done in this country, and have decreased the revenues and increased the cost of collection and taken away the manufacture of $30,000,000 of woolens from the workmen of this country. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has said that this side of the House has not undertaken anything to relieve the country in its distress.

Mr. DOCKERY. I did not say that side of the House. I said this Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. This Congress; not this House.

Mr. DOCKERY. I also said that the other side of the House had not reported any bill to repeal the existing tariff law.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, there are three factors in legislation—the House, the Senate, and the President—and unless all three concur there can be no legislative results. The House is the only one of these three factors that is under the control of the Republicans. Here we do have a majority, and we are responsible for what we attempt to do. We are not responsible for what the Democratic and Populistic Senate refuses to do. [Applause on the Republican side.] We are not responsible when all the influence of the Democratic Administration is brought to bear against legislation that may be undertaken by the House.

Now, what has the House undertaken to do to meet the situation? When it met here in December it found that since the 1st of July, 1896, there had been a steady and continuous deficiency of revenue amounting on the 31st day of December to about $130,000,000. That is what we found. The first thing that the Republican majority of the House did was to present and pass within five days after the committees were announced a bill to increase the annual revenues $40,000,000, which would at once, if it could have become law, have provided sufficient revenues to meet every expenditure and stop the deficiency which then existed and has continued up to this hour. We did not undertake to revise the tariff in doing that. We did not undertake to do it because, in the first place, it would take so much time. The exigency was too great. In the next place, we knew that it would at once be said that we had proposed a purely Republican measure in order that it might not pass a Democratic and Populistic Senate and be approved by the Democratic President. Therefore we selected what came nearest at hand to meet the exigency for two years and a half and to provide $40,000,000 of revenue to meet the expenses of this Government. We sent that to the Senate.

Now, the gentleman has said that was defeated in the Senate. That is true. But every Democratic and every Populist member voted against the bill to increase the revenue in this House; and every Democratic Senator and every Populist Senator voted against it in the Senate, and the Democrats and Populists united, working together, as they did in opposition to more revenue, defeated it in the Senate; no matter what four or five Republicans may have done, the Democratic and Populist Senators were sufficient to defeat it, and they are responsible for it.

Now, in view of such facts, what is to be said about the claim that the Republican House has pursued a do-nothing policy and has not attempted to meet the situation? They have done everything that they could do under the circumstances, but they could not control the Senate nor could they control a Democratic President.

When we attempted to reduce the interest on the bonds for which authority had been given under the act of 1875, we had the united opposition of those gentlemen; when we attempted to provide that money raised by selling bonds, ostensibly for redemption purposes, should not be used to meet deficiencies of revenue, they voted solidly against it, and affirmatively for the process that has been going on since July 1, 1893. Of course it is evident from these demonstrations that so far as the united Republican Senate is concerned, with a Democratic President, we were to have no cooperation in these measures. Hence, after the repeated efforts in this direction, there is but one thing to do, namely, to appeal to the people in the approaching elections in November, and to allow them to say whether there shall not be a Senate and a President that will cooperate with the Republican House in furnishing sufficient revenue to run this Government, and stop the industry of issuing bonds to meet deficiencies of revenue in time of peace. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to ask my friend from Maine a question before he takes his seat. I understood him to say that Democratic Senators and Populist Senators had prevented the passage of the bill to which he alluded.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. Will my friend be kind enough to tell the committee how he classes the two Senators from Colorado?

Mr. DINGLEY. I simply said that so far as any Republicans voted against the consideration of the bill their votes effected nothing, one way or the other, because the Democrats and the Populists united controlled the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. But are not the Republicans who voted with the Democrats and Populists equally responsible for the results?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not so much. I think they are partly responsible, but not so much as the Democrats and Populists who voted solidly together, because their votes combined controlled the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the Republican party call upon the Republicans of the States represented by those recalcitrant Senators who refused to cooperate with the Republicans of the House in carrying forward their legislation to replace those Senators?

Mr. DINGLEY. The Republicans of those States will be able to take care of themselves.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the organization of the Senate is in the hands of the Republicans.

Mr. DINGLEY. What do you mean by the organization?

Mr. DOCKERY. I refer to the Republican trade with the Populists.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman knows that the Democrats and the Populists united control the Senate.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party is willing to assume, and will assume, every responsibility that justly belongs to it; but when the Republican party and any other party combine to control the organization of the Senate, as was recently done, it shall not shift the responsibility upon us, for it does not belong to us. In response to the gentleman from Maine, I say you bought the organization of the Senate and paid for it, and why do you not control it? The gentleman from Maine has said that it was a combination of the Democrats and Populists that defeated his bill in the Senate.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. In a moment. I am dealing now with you, chairman, and when I get through with him I shall take pleasure in joining issue with you.

Mr. TAWNEY. All right.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Maine has charged that it was a combination of Democratic and Populist Senators who stopped his bill in the Senate. What are the facts? The chairman of the Republican national executive committee of the United States, Senator CARTER, is one of the "Populists," who stood in your way and defeated the bill. Another is Mr. WOLCOTT. Another is Senator DUBOIS, and another is Senator TELLER. Does the gentleman claim that Mr. TELLER is a Populist? Is Mr. DUBOIS one? I believe he is a member of your steering committee. Is Mr. CARTER a Populist? He is chairman yet of your national committee. Is Mr. WOLCOTT a Populist? If you call those gentlemen Populists, you cut off a good deal of the respectability of your own party, and you may need some of them in the next election.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there any doubt of the fact that the Democratic Senators and the Populist Senators, united as they were on that vote, did, as a matter of fact, have a majority of the Senate, no matter where Senator TELLER or Senator CARTER may have stood?

Mr. McMILLIN. When I say that four or five of your Republican Senators were the men who held the balance of power and said that you should not any longer plunder the country and defeated your bill, I speak a truth which no one can gainsay. They did it.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Why do you not answer Governor DINGLEY's question? [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. If you are not satisfied with the way that Governor DINGLEY is taking care of this question and your party, I will cheerfully take you in his place in this discussion.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I want you to answer his question.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have stated the facts. The facts are that four Republican Senators threw themselves athwart your path and told you that they would no longer help you to rob and fleece the American people by processes of taxation. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the Republican side.] You can say "Oh," but I want to announce to the country the further fact that when you passed that bill here you yourselves said that it was not such a measure as ought to become a law. You had no heart in it. The country had no faith in it.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Why do you not answer Governor DINGLEY's question? [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I have answered Governor DINGLEY's question. My only regret is that I can not give you the intelligence to see the force of the answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Oh!

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, he has not answered my question. I asked him if it was not true that the Democratic and the Populist Senators had a majority of the Senate and that their votes would control it.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the Democratic party do not control the Populists. If they did, you would not have organized the Senate.

Mr. DINGLEY. The Democrats and Populists seem to work together, though.

Mr. McMILLIN. You were willing to swap the biggest committee in the Senate, the one that has to do with finances—you were willing to trade that off in order to get the loaves and fishes of the Senate. You made the trade deliberately, and should not now complain at the result.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the bill to raise more revenue was defeated in the Senate—in the Senate; we are not talking about committees—by the combined vote of the Democratic Senators and the Populists.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have mentioned the fact, and the gentleman can not escape it, that the chairman of the Republican executive committee led that movement against your tariff bill. And he did right. You can not get away from the fact. You can not escape the responsibility. You may reason as much about it as you please, but the fact remains.

Mr. TAWNEY. He simply came in after the bill was defeated and made the explanation why he voted as he did. Therefore he did not lead the fight against the revenue measure.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman does not deny that he was in the fight.

Mr. TAWNEY. I deny that he led the fight.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not care who led it. You may say that the Democrats led it or the Republicans led it; but the Republicans held the balance of power and controlled the action on the measure and stopped your robbery.

Mr. TAWNEY. The question is, Was the measure defeated in the committee or in the Senate?

Mr. McMILLIN. In the Senate.

Mr. TAWNEY. And who controlled in the Senate?

Mr. McMILLIN. The Republicans and the Populists organized the committees in the Senate [derisive laughter on the Republican side] by a bargain that was no credit to the Republican party—a party that is always ready to bargain with anybody or anything, to sacrifice principle for temporary expediency.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the committees do not control the Senate. The gentleman from Tennessee knows that very well. It was in the Senate that the revenue bill was defeated—not in committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. The four Republican Senators that I have named controlled, it seemed, in the Senate.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to let some of the other assertions of the gentleman from Maine escape a little attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] has expired.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask a few minutes additional. There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Maine has said that the Wilson bill is necessarily more expensive in administration than the McKinley bill. Why, sir, no man who will think about the proposition for a moment can come to any other conclusion than that the gentleman must have lost his usual brightness and acumen before he made such a statement. Does he forget that a large number of articles were put on the free list by that bill and thereby the laws of collection simplified? Does he forget that as to many articles the method of raising revenue by a combined ad valorem and specific duty was done away with and a single method substituted? The fact is that the Wilson bill provided ample revenue. We are not responsible for the state of affairs—

Mr. TAWNEY. Ample revenue for what?

Mr. McMILLIN. Ample revenue to run the Government. I do not insist that it would run the Government according to your prodigal method of running the Government, but that it would provide a sufficiency for all practical and necessary purposes.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROUT. If the administration of the present tariff law does not cost more than the previous law, will the gentleman tell me why it is that the Secretary of the Treasury estimates for the present fiscal year a deficiency of $1,150,000 in expenses of collecting the revenue, to be provided for in this bill, whereas for the last year of the administration of the McKinley law only $450,000 was required in addition to the regular appropriation? Why this increased expenditure?

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman knows—he and I have been here a good while—that we have never seen a Congress yet that was wise enough to appropriate the exact amount necessary to run any one of the Departments of the Government. There is almost always a deficiency—sometimes greater and sometimes less. But what I am arguing—and this is the way I answer the question—is that when we have reduced the number of articles upon which calculations must be made and when we have adopted a method of collecting a single form of duty instead of a combination of ad valorem and specific duties, there must necessarily be less expense under a proper administration of such a law than under the previous law.

Mr. GROUT rose.

Mr. McMILLIN. I should be very glad to yield to the gentleman further, but it is impossible for me to do so in my limited time.

I was going on to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Democratic party provided ample revenue to run the Government. In addition to what is now being obtained, and which comes within thirty or thirty-five millions of providing running expenses, we provided for an income tax that would have yielded from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 a year. If that income tax had been allowed to stand and enforced, there would have been no difficulty about revenues meeting expenditures. But, unfortunately for the country, unfortunately for the high standing of the Supreme Court, there was one individual, known as Shiras, who had broken into that court, who revolutionized the law, who overturned the Constitution, and cut off $40,000,000 of the revenues of the Government, and that is the difficulty that is standing in the way now, of which the gentleman complains so much. Shiras is the difference between surplus and deficiency. Shiras, who under oath decided both ways, and gave no reason for his wonderful somersault.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not true that the McKinley bill was furnishing sufficient revenue for the expenditures of the Government during the period of its operation. On the contrary, about one hundred million of surplus revenue in the Treasury of the United States was turned over to his successor when Mr. Cleveland left that office after his first Administration, and every dollar of it was squandered by the operation of the McKinley bill, on account of the deficiencies which necessarily resulted and which that bill had legislated upon the statute books.

Thus much I was determined should be said on behalf of the legislation of the last Congress and for the purpose of fixing the responsibilities for whatever has gone wrong in this Congress.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKERY] very properly asked, in the course of his remarks with reference to the legislation of this Congress and the responsibility of the Republican party, "What have you done?" I repeat the inquiry, What have you done? Have you passed the bankruptcy bill? Have you passed a funding bill for the Pacific railroads, whose indebtedness is now falling due and which are in the hands of receivers? Have you dealt with any of the great questions which are admittedly pressing upon the attention of Congress? No; you have done nothing. You have acknowledged, by your very proposition to adjourn in a few days, that you are not capable of handling them, and are going to run away from them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, this discussion has taken a very much wider range than was contemplated by my colleague on the committee when he opened it and pointed out to the members of the committee the enormous increase in the expenditure for the Treasury Department during the present Administration. Gentlemen on the other side, when this matter was called to their attention, seemed to think it was necessary to make an attack on the Republican party and to make some comparison between the Republican party of this country and the Democratic party as to the legislation of the last few years.

Now, sir, it was rather an unfortunate suggestion for my friend from Missouri [Mr. DICKERY] to make, because every person familiar with the history of the country knows that the golden industrial period of America was during the four years of President Harrison's Administration. It reached high-water mark under the operation of the so-called McKinley law. During the operation of that law, during the Administration of President Harrison, there was not an enforced idle man in America. They were receiving higher wages—higher rates of wages—than had ever been known in this country or in the history of the world. Our foreign commerce had increased in a marvelous manner. Our exports and imports during the last year of Mr. Harrison's Administration were $200,000,000 more than under any one year preceding it in the whole history of the Government.

With such a condition of prosperity as that prevailing, with the growth of every industry with unparalleled rapidity, with the business interests of the country far in excess of any other point which had ever before been attained, the Democratic party came into full power. And, Mr. Chairman, what did they do? Their first effort was to strike down this law, this beneficent law, that had given this magnificent era of prosperity. They were challenged by Republican members to the fact that their legislation would not bring revenue enough into the Treasury to pay the running expenses of the Government, and also the policy they inaugurated under the Wilson bill would strike down the industries of the country and turn honest workmen out into the highways and the streets and make tramps of them.

Their attention was called to the fact that under the reciprocity clause of this great tariff measure the ports of Cuba and of South America had been opened to American commerce, and that millions of the products of our farms and factories were finding markets there from which they had been shut out before the enactment of this law. Their attention was called to the fact that the German ports had been opened under this clause of the law to American meats, to American cattle, and American flour; that France had been compelled under reciprocity legislation to open her markets to American flour as well, and that this immense trade had already set in. But, sir, they heeded not any of these admonitions on the part of the Republicans. They struck them all down, knowing when they did it that they would get nothing in return, but that, on the contrary, they would deprive us of the markets of Cuba, the markets of Brazil, and of Germany and France.

Now, what is the result? Under the Harrison Administration the revenues of the Government, brought in under the operation of the McKinley law, were not only more than sufficient to meet the current expenditures of the Government, but, under the wise administration of the Republican party, the excess was applied to the payment of the national debt, and more than $260,000,000 of the national debt was paid off. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but the Republican party turned the Treasury over with $107,000,000 in gold and nearly $40,000,000 of other money to the incoming Democratic Administration. What has been done by the Democratic party or the Democratic Administration since it came into power? Instead of paying off any part of our national debt, they have increased our national debt in the enormous sum of $262,315,000 in a period of a little over three years' time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask for five minutes more time, Mr. Chairman.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. This imposes upon the people of this country an indebtedness in interest alone of $11,492,616 over and above the other expenditures that we had under a Republican Administration. This expense comes year after year, and these $262,000,000 are a mortgage upon the people of this country extending over a period of thirty years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKERY] says that we should repeal this law if it is working in the manner I have indicated. I say to him that he is one of the men responsible for increasing our national debt; he is one of the men responsible for turning American workmen out of their shops into the highways to tramp and beg for bread. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Democratic party is responsible for the wrecks which have been strewn from the Atlantic to the Pacific in the industries of this country, brought upon the people by this Gorman tariff bill.

Now, what is this bill? The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] says that it would have brought sufficient revenue into the Treasury if the income tax had been sustained. Does not the gentleman know that when that portion of the bill was presented here the best lawyers in the House and the country told him and his colleagues that it was unconstitutional? Did not even the great Democratic leader from New York [Senator HILL] make his opposition to that legislation upon the ground that it was unconstitutional? And yet they pressed it forward, knowing at the time that the revenues of the country would be insufficient to pay the expenditures. I say it comes with poor grace for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], or any other gentleman on that side of the House, to attempt to defend any of these indictments presented here by the Republican members of this committee. Now, in the face of all this we find that this Department here has increased its expenditures nearly $500,000 over what they were during the last year of Harrison's Administration—

Mr. GROUT. More than $700,000 in the collection of the revenue alone.

Mr. HOPKINS. Seven hundred thousand dollars. The gentleman from Missouri has approved of an increase of 273 new offices in the revenue department of the Government alone.

Mr. DOCKERY. In what paragraph of the bill?

Mr. HOPKINS. I find that without protest on this floor he has approved of increased salaries of 168 more.

Mr. DOCKERY. In what paragraph of the bill?

Mr. HOPKINS. The bill that we are considering.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, I protested against that when I was on the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, Mr. Chairman, how did this matter come up? Did the gentleman spring to the front like an athlete in opposition to it, as he usually does here when some poor claimant with a hundred-dollar claim that ought to be paid comes before us? Not at all. When this bill was presented here to this House the gentleman knew of these increased salaries and this increased force, and yet he sat there as silent as death until he was forced from his seat by the debate in which other members had been participating, when, to save his consistency, as he supposed, he made his faint objection to it. And yet he knows, as I know, that he voted for the bill in the committee, and I venture to say that he will vote for it in this committee and in the House.

A MEMBER. The report of the committee is unanimous.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I think the House and the country very well understand the respective responsibilities of the Republican and Democratic parties in reference to the question of inadequate revenue.

I want to refer for just a moment to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. He announced at the outset of his remarks that the Harrison Administration covered the golden period of American industries. If so, Mr. Chairman—and I am quite disposed to agree with him, at least so far as political industries are concerned—will he tell the House why the country turned down the Republican party both in 1890 and in 1892?

Mr. GROUT. Because they did not know what they were doing.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did not know what they were doing?

Mr. HOPKINS. They repented of it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I never knew the American people to display more intelligence than they manifested in the campaigns of 1890 and 1892, when they retired the Republican party.

Mr. MILNES. They have mourned it ever since.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, something has been said about expenditures having been increased. Why, sir, the total expenditures of the Government, exclusive of bond purchases and premiums thereon, under the Administration of Mr. Harrison, were $1,330,394,780.55, while the total expenditures under the first Administration of Mr. Cleveland were but $1,063,223,202.93. The entire income under the Administration of Mr. Harrison was $1,539,728,590.58, the receipts during Mr. Cleveland's first Administration being $1,451,660,246.74. The receipts of President Harrison's Administration exceeded Cleveland's by $88,063,343.84, the expenditures under Mr. Harrison being also greater by $267,171,577.63 than they were under President Cleveland.

Mr. LACEY. May I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. DOCKERY. I can not yield; my time is so limited.

Mr. DINGLEY. They had the benefit of the Republican policy.

Mr. DOCKERY. Again, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has rolled as a sweet morsel under his tongue the statement that $250,000,000 of bonds were retired under Harrison's Administration. The gentleman is correct as to the statement of the principal, but the cost of those bonds was $292,963,486.67. During the term of President Cleveland's first Administration bonds at a cost of $360,419,953.11 were retired.

Mr. HOPKINS. How many have you retired in Cleveland's present Administration?

Mr. DOCKERY. I regret to say that the President has been following in the footsteps of the Republican party by paying out gold only to meet the coin obligations of the Government instead of both gold and silver. Therefore an increase of the debt. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the McKinley bill, so much vaunted in this presence, during the last four months of President Harrison's Administration failed to meet current expenditures by $4,094,021.33.

Mr. HOPKINS. But that was after the election, and the threat of the Democratic party to revise the tariff kept the people from importing goods.

Mr. DOCKERY. The approaching financial disaster was felt in all departments of business before the election.

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all.

Mr. DOCKERY. The fact is—

Mr. HOPKINS. The friends of the Democratic party in Europe kept their goods over there and abstained from exporting them, so that they could be imported under the Wilson bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I decline to yield for a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. It was because of the business paralysis, which first manifested itself after the failure of Baring Bros. in 1890—

Mr. HOPKINS. It commenced after the success of the Democratic party.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman will please not interrupt me without my permission. I am willing to yield to all reasonable requests—

Mr. WASHINGTON. Hit him again.

Mr. DOCKERY (continuing). But I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will not interrupt you again.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that the business depression began soon after the failure of Baring Bros. in 1890, and continued until it encircled the globe; and because of its presence in 1892 the Republican party was overwhelmingly defeated. Let us look further in the presentation of this comparative exhibit. What was the Treasury surplus when President Cleveland turned over the control of national affairs to Mr. Harrison? It amounted then, including the gold reserve, to $183,827,190.29 of available cash assets.

Mr. HOPKINS. But that was put there under a Republican law.

Mr. DOCKERY. At the close of Mr. Harrison's Administration the surplus had been reduced to $124,128,087.88, notwithstanding the Republican Administration had defaulted in the sinking-fund requirement to the amount of nearly $50,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was about to say that the surplus was thus largely reduced, notwithstanding the Republican party had defaulted for the first time since the civil strife, in the payment of the sinking fund, to perhaps $50,000,000; notwithstanding they had extended bonds maturing on September 1, 1891, amounting to $25,864,500; notwithstanding the receipts under Mr. Harrison were $88,063,343.84 greater than under President Cleveland; notwithstanding that the Sherman Act ruthlessly covered into the Treasury to be used for current expenses a trust fund belonging to the holders of national bank notes amounting to $54,207,975.75; and finally the surplus was thus meager, notwithstanding Mr. Harrison had reduced the balances of disbursing officers available for the payment of current expenses from $47,905,423.30, the amount to their credit when Mr. Cleveland retired from office on the 4th of March, 1889, to $23,515,033.70, when he returned to the Executive Mansion March 4, 1893.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, these are the facts and figures disclosed by official records. No sophistry in which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] can indulge—and he is an accomplished master in that art—can change these rugged facts. During the four years of President Harrison's Administration the Republican party not only squandered the surplus of the people in riotous living—a surplus accumulated under Democratic rule—but they also enacted laws under which we are required to appropriate large sums of money, thus coercing Congress to an easy approach to a billion-dollar total, although in the last Congress that limit was escaped by rigid economy.

Mr. GROUT. Was not the surplus that Cleveland piled up in his first Administration accumulated by not paying the debt with the surplus, as his predecessors had invariably done.

Mr. DOCKERY. There was paid out during his first Administration a little in excess of $360,000,000 for the purchase of bonds.

Mr. GROUT. He paid a little, but not near so much as was paid under Mr. Arthur's Administration.

Mr. DOCKERY. I present these official figures and am willing to resign my seat to-morrow should they prove to be inaccurate. They are correct.

I repeat again that the cost of the bonds retired by Mr. Harrison was $292,963,486.67; the cost of the bonds retired by Mr. Cleveland being $360,419,953.11. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROUT. Now, one word—

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Appropriations; he is an intelligent gentleman and an honest man, usually [laughter] candid, and he ought to be candid in this presence. I know that he would not knowingly make a misstatement, but he has been misled as to the facts.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] seems to desire to escape responsibility. No gentleman on that side of the House and no member of the Republican party is a more accomplished legislator or better able to make a bad cause seem like a good one than the gentleman from Maine, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. When, however, he seeks to avoid responsibility for the work of this session, he should remember that the Republican party controls the organization of the Senate committees. There are but 39 Democrats in that body. There are 44 straight Republicans and 6 Populists, including Senator JONES of Nevada, who was elected as a Republican and has always acted with that party, except on the bond bill and upon questions relating to the free coinage of silver.

Mr. DINGLEY. But he declared himself a Populist over a year ago.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Republican party controls the organization of the Senate committees and accepted that responsibility as a result of a "dicker" with the Populist Senators, who sat silent and declined to vote when the Republicans captured the organization, and they can not, therefore, escape their responsibility. So far as the action of the President is concerned, it is not a matter for legitimate consideration at this time. This do-nothing Congress has failed to present a single relief measure to the President for approval or disapproval, although there was no occasion for hesitation, because it is known that upon financial questions the President is more nearly in accord with the Republican party than with the majority of his own party. [Applause.]

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, just a word with reference to what the gentleman from Missouri says about the relative amount of the public debt paid under Harrison's Administration and the first Cleveland Administration. It will be remembered that of Mr. Harrison's Administration there were only two years when he had surplus revenue to pay out on the public debt. The two last years of his Administration were under the McKinley law, whereby, in response to the demand of the Democracy that taxation should be reduced, it was reduced by over $60,000,000 a year, so that, as I have said, in the last two years of Mr. Harrison's Administration he paid nothing on the public debt. He could not pay anything. Matters were so adjusted that the revenue should just about meet the expenditure, and it did meet the expenditure up to the very day when Mr. Cleveland again took the chair.

Now, the question I asked the gentleman, and which he did not answer, was, How has Mr. Cleveland's Administration compared with the Administration of Garfield and of Arthur in respect to payments upon the public debt? I have not the figures before me, but I have in mind, in general outline, the amounts paid under these two Administrations, and the figures will show that only a little more than one-half as much was paid by Mr. Cleveland as was paid by Garfield and Arthur. That was the question I put to the gentleman, and it is a perfectly fair one, too, but he did not answer it. It is not fair to compare what the Harrison Administration paid during two years with what was paid by Mr. Cleveland during his term. But if gentlemen insist on doing so and will keep in mind that Harrison paid nearly as much in two years as Cleveland did in four, they will feel like withdrawing their cheers for the bluff answer of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is hardly a fair comparison to retire into the asylum of ancient history.

Mr. GROUT. Are Garfield's and Arthur's Administrations ancient history, Mr. Chairman? Gentlemen on the other side know what the facts are. They know the facts tell this story, that Mr. Cleveland, to make it appear that there ought to be a revision of the tariff such as he desired, piled up the revenues of the country and distributed between sixty and seventy million dollars to favorite national banks on deposit without interest, instead of paying out the money on the public debt, as his predecessors had done. I repeat, therefore, that he paid only a little more than one-half the amount that was paid by preceding Republican Administrations, and this is the whole secret of his much-vaunted surplus.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman state the amounts of bonds that were retired under President Garfield, President Arthur, President Cleveland's first Administration, and President Harrison's Administration.

Mr. GROUT. I can not give the exact amounts.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman give the amount approximately?

Mr. GROUT. I will not undertake to state the figures here, but I will insert them in my remarks.

Mr. DOCKERY. I thought the gentleman knew the figures.

Mr. GROUT. No; I stated in the outset that I could not give the exact figures, but I have already stated them approximately. I have said that President Arthur and President Garfield paid almost twice as much on the public debt as Mr. Cleveland paid.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in extension of my remarks, according to promise, I give the exact amounts paid on the bonded debt by the three Administrations above named: Garfield and Arthur, $479,989,280; Cleveland's first, $341,396,280—just $138,586,300 less than Garfield and Arthur; and this difference was more than three times as large as the free surplus left by Cleveland in the Treasury at the close of his term, which was but $48,096,153.50.

Harrison paid in the first two years and four months of his term $234,009,640—within $107,886,640 as much as Cleveland paid in a full four years. As already stated, during the last year and a half of Harrison's term there was no excess of revenue for application on the public debt. It was only a little in excess of expenditures.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there are ten minutes remaining on the gentleman's side and seventeen on the other.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to notify the Chair now, in a modest way, that I would like to have the last five minutes myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize some gentleman upon the other side now.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary question. I understood the order to be that the discussion should close at 4 o'clock, which would leave forty minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair is informed that the vote was that the debate should close at a quarter to 4.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now recognize some gentleman on the other side.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not think the Chair should undertake to control as to when this side of the House should speak.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER], on the other side of the House, has been desiring to speak for the last half hour—

Mr. CANNON. We have but ten minutes on this side, and there are seventeen minutes remaining on the other, I believe. I will say to my colleague on the committee that it looks to me as if possibly this side ought to close the discussion.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well; but you have fifteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON. No; only ten.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well, Mr. Chairman; then I will proceed now.

This is the first time in the history of appropriation bills—at least since I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations—that the chairman of that committee and the majority of the House have precipitated a political discussion when the bill was under discussion. I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that this bill would be considered in an orderly manner and with reference alone to the items in the bill. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has seen proper to precipitate a discussion by an assault upon the Secretary of the Treasury because of an increase of several hundred thousand dollars in the expenditures for the collection of the customs.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, and I admit it, that there has been an increase in the expenditures in this branch of the service; and it seems, from the statement given by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, that this increase has been brought about partly by the increase of salaries and the increase in the number of officers. Now, I do not approve of the increase of salaries, nor do I approve of an increase in the number of officers, unless it can be shown most conclusively that such increases are justified by the exigency of the service. I submit that no information has yet been given to this committee which would justify it in reaching a conclusion as to whether these increases were necessary or unnecessary. It is impossible in the present status of the question, as it is before this committee, for any gentleman to arrive at a conclusion as to whether those increases were proper or not.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I find on page 15 of this bill, under the heading "Collecting internal revenue," this provision:

That the number of deputy collectors and clerks employed in the collection of internal revenue shall not be increased, nor shall the salary of said officers and employees be increased beyond the salaries paid during the last fiscal year.

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman why it is not entirely feasible and proper to attach such a proviso to the portion of the bill now under discussion?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, any gentleman who is at all familiar with these two branches of the service—that which collects excise duties and that which collects customs duties—must know that the methods of collection in the two branches are entirely different. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Republican as he is, representing the majority on this floor, would not, I am confident, rise from his seat and advocate the putting of any such limitation upon the pending paragraph as has been inserted in the bill with reference to the internal-revenue service. It would be unwise to do so.

But, Mr. Chairman, I was going on to say that from a criticism of the item of appropriation under consideration members of the committee have proceeded to discuss the question of expenditures under the present and the past Administrations. I do not think this discussion should have been entered upon at the present time. I was in the hope that it would have been delayed until Congress was about to adjourn, when, in an orderly manner, the representatives of both parties on the Appropriations Committee could present statements to the House and to the country as to the character and amount of the appropriations made by the present Congress. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has anticipated such a presentation of the matter; and I now desire to call his attention—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I had more than five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that this discussion was proceeding under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SAYERS. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to say that one-half the time would be under my control.

Mr. PITNEY. I ask that the gentleman from Texas have the privilege of occupying so much of the remaining time on his side as he may think proper.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, let me invite the attention of my friend from Illinois to a few figures. I take the Fifty-first Congress. There were then no Populists in the Senate to interfere with the progress of appropriation bills. The Democrats were then sadly in the minority. The Republicans had control of the House and of the Senate, and the President was a Republican. Now, let us see how the matter stood in that Congress upon the question of deficiencies.

Notwithstanding large appropriations were made at the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, we find that at its second session that Congress was called upon to appropriate $38,699,746.96 for deficiencies, to say nothing of the $19,498,531.10 carried in the miscellaneous bills.

Will the gentleman find anything in the conduct of the present Administration to compare with such extravagance in public expenditures as that? What is the total amount of deficiencies at the present time? Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in charge of this bill and his associates have placed upon the urgency deficiency bill, which was passed some time ago, large sums of money which in no sense of the word can be called deficiencies.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman speaks of large sums appropriated by way of deficiencies in the Fifty-first Congress. Does he not know that they related largely to pension appropriations, which are necessarily indefinite, because we can not tell the exact amount required? I refer now to the act of 1890.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I will show the gentleman. Exclude the pensions, and what do we find? The deficiencies, coupled with the miscellaneous appropriations, amounted in the second session of the Fifty-first Congress to nearly $30,000,000. Let me call my friend's attention to the actual figures. The total number of deficiencies at the second session of Congress amounted to $38,699,746.96. That included $29,335,598.34 for pensions. Now, subtracting the pension deficiency from the sum total, we have left $9,364,148.62 for other deficiencies, and add to that $19,498,531.10 carried in the miscellaneous acts, and we have $28,862,679.72, besides what was carried in the regular appropriation bills of the second session of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. HOPKINS. Can the gentleman from Texas take the miscellaneous items and mention or show to this committee or to the country any money misappropriated or extravagantly appropriated? You give gross sums, but no Democrat has ever, to my knowledge, since the Congress of which you speak held its sessions, pointed out a single item that was extravagant in character. On the contrary, the matter before us now, and to which I made allusion in the course of my remarks at the opening of this debate, is a specific item of expenditure.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, here are over twenty-eight millions of dollars, excluding the deficiencies for pension bills. Let us see how the deficiency bills at this session have been loaded with appropriations that can not be classed as deficiencies. In the urgent deficiency bill there was put $300,000 for printing an agricultural report, in order that the members might have the report before the termination of this Congress; but it was in no sense a deficiency, and ought not to have been included in that bill. For the Library building another was also included in that bill—an appropriation of $480,000, not a penny of which will be expended during the present fiscal year.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me interrupt the gentleman for a moment. That printing bill to which he refers was for a report to be circulated all over the country for the benefit of the people, I believe.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Agricultural Reports, were they not?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; but the appropriation for them was not a deficiency.

Mr. HOPKINS. It does not matter whether it was or not.

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, yes; it does. That is the very question at this time.

Mr. HOPKINS. My point is that the appropriation itself is one that commends itself to the good judgment of the country.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, now I can almost foresee what the gentleman from Illinois will say when he mounts the stump during the coming campaign and presents the Republican side in the controversies that will necessarily arise.

When he is faced with a billion-dollar Congress the gentleman will say: "Why, the Fifty-third Congress put upon us the necessity of appropriating $11,000,000 of deficiencies." Now, my purpose is to call the attention of the gentleman and the committee to the fact that items are included as deficiencies that properly belong to other appropriation bills.

There are included in the present bill, Mr. Chairman, near $500,000 of appropriations that can not be considered as deficiencies, and for which the last Congress was not responsible in any sense of the word, and for which it should not be held accountable.

But there is one thing to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, if he will listen to me for a moment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Entirely.

Mr. SAYERS. Can the gentleman from Illinois point to a single item of appropriation made by the last Congress which was indefinite in character? Did not the appropriation bills which passed that Congress at both sessions carry on their face the exact amount of the money the bills appropriated?

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, now, if the gentleman—

Mr. SAYERS (continuing). And I ask him to compare that record with that of the present Congress in this particular and tell us the result.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, you challenge my attention to another matter. You evade the point I make.

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all. I understood the point you made and have answered, and now I call your attention to a point that has a direct bearing upon the pending controversy.

Mr. HOPKINS. On the contrary, I think not. In the discussion here I called attention to nearly three-quarters of a million of money extravagantly expended in one of the Departments of the Government, and you reply by saying that the Fifty-first Congress was a billion-dollar Congress. I challenged the issue, and asked you to show an item that was extravagant in character and that did not meet the approval of all honest men, and you fail to do it; but you state that in the Fifty-second Congress you had the items specified in the bill.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is only answering my question by asking another. I put the question to the gentleman from Illinois if he can show a single instance in the appropriation bills of the last Congress—

Mr. HOPKINS. That does not meet the issue at all.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand that on last suspension day the gentleman advocated the passage of the river and harbor bill under suspension of the rules. Is that true?

Mr. HOPKINS. That is true, and I would do it again.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask that the time be given to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand, the time of the gentleman from Texas is exhausted, but if he desires more—

Mr. SAYERS. I should like to have five minutes more. I desire to get through with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. CANNON. I will ask unanimous consent that the time be extended ten minutes, but I want to ask the right to control all of the remaining time except five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent that the time of debate on this paragraph be extended ten minutes, five minutes to be given to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CANNON. That will leave fifteen minutes on this side, and I should like to control the last ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] will please give me his attention. He began this debate. We should have passed this bill by this time if it had not been for him. The gentleman says he favored the river and harbor bill, and that he would do it again. That bill carries nominally upon its face about $10,000,000, besides contracts amounting in all to over $80,000,000. But yet there is to be added to this amount a concealed and an indefinite appropriation which will amount to at least $3,000,000 when it is expended. The House generally knew nothing about this item, though it provides for the expenditure of fully $3,000,000 which is not expressed on the face of the bill.

Mr. NORTHWAY. What was it? What was the concealed appropriation of $3,000,000?

Mr. SAYERS. To purchase the locks and dams on the Monongahela River. You voted for it, and not one gentleman in ten in the House understood that he was voting for it. Now, whatever may be the sins of the Democratic party—

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and I wish to state to the gentleman from Texas that there was nothing concealed about that.

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, I do not mean to say—the gentleman understands me—

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There was no appropriation of $3,000,000. It is to be a condemnation proceeding in open court, and in the opinion of the executive officers, if the award is not proper, the Government is not bound to take the property. The gentleman from Texas is entirely wrong in his construction of it.

Mr. SAYERS. My friend must not take his seat now after asking that question. Is there not an indefinite appropriation in that bill?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. To pay for the award?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman state that?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Let me answer the question. There is an award, provided that award, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, is fair and just. There is nothing obligatory, so far as the provision of the bill is concerned, upon the United States to take the award and pay it, regardless of its amount.

Mr. SAYERS. Does not the bill appropriate a sufficient amount of money to pay for the award, if it should be accepted by the Government?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; but I can defend that, and any other man can who knows the facts.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Is it not estimated by the office of the engineers that it will probably require $3,000,000 to pay this award?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Possibly; yes.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman, then, has admitted the truth of what I have said.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is to relieve the great amount of business which goes up and down that river from paying tolls to a private corporation.

Mr. SAYERS. I am not arguing the merits of the case at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. You assumed that nobody knew anything about it. It was openly and notoriously discussed in the committee for days and days.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not deny the statement.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And stated upon the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think every member except the gentleman from Texas knew all about it.

Mr. SAYERS. I am glad that they did. But I hear several gentlemen around me say that they did not know anything about it. We are not all as wise as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], who seems to have concentrated within his brain all the power of what is known as the X rays. Possibly he can see through a bill without ever having read it or heard any one read it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all. The difference between the gentleman from Texas and "the gentleman from Illinois" is that he attends to his duties and the gentleman from Texas does not.

Mr. HEPBURN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this debate has wandered a long way from the original starting point. We were considering a provision to appropriate $850,000 to meet the expense of collecting the customs revenue, in addition to the miscellaneous collections that may be appropriated in that way and the permanent appropriation of $5,500,000. That becomes necessary because of an increase of 169 officers as compared with 1893 at the port of New York alone. A little while ago a great deal of prattle went out through all parts of this country because in one of the Departments, by dismissing the seed division of that Department, the expense of employing some 30 or 40 clerks was saved to the Government, and a gentleman, one of the economists of the House, all of last Congress was devoting himself to saving the expense of the salaries of 169 clerks in this very department of the Treasury.

How gentlemen plumed themselves upon this economy! And yet here we find an officer, with the apparent approval of that side of the House, certainly without any word rebuking him, assuming authority to increase the number of employees in one of the custom-houses of the country 169 and increasing the expenditures more than a quarter of a million of dollars. Not one word of condemnation from that side of the House! The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] said that they were not responsible for what was done in this House or Congress. But, Mr. Chairman, they are responsible for this item of increased expenditure, because it is done through the power that is lodged in the Secretary and done by him, and, as I have said, without any comment upon that side. It is done, too, sir, in my judgment, under circumstances that are absolutely indefensible.

Compare the imports at that custom-house in 1893 with those of last year and you will find, Mr. Chairman, that they have decreased $21,000,000. Twenty-one million dollars less of merchandise went through the hands of the custom-house officers at the port of New York in 1895 than there did in 1893. In 1893 to handle all this amount of $548,000,000 of imports there were 1,793 employees. In 1895 to dispose of and care for $477,000,000 of imports of all classes, dutiable and nondutiable, there were of employees at that port 1,922, an increase of 169, to dispose of a smaller volume of business; and that, too, at a great increase in the salaries of these men. I find that there are 66 examiners in the appraisers' stores at New York whose salaries have been increased, not by act of Congress, but by act of the Secretary, under that discretionary power that Congress gives to him. This $850,000 of deficiency is not the amount that he requires, for under the estimates $1,150,000 are necessary, he tells us, to make good this extraordinary expense for the payment of 268 officers in half a dozen custom-houses.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eight minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to the gentleman from Illinois for yielding me this time. I just asked him to yield it for the purpose of resenting a statement, or rather an insinuation, I should say, put forth by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS rose.

Mr. HOPKINS. Do not interrupt the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SAYERS. You can not control me.

Mr. HOPKINS. You would be a better man if I did.

Mr. SAYERS. Possibly so; probably not. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes so that I can disabuse his mind as to any intimation by me that the provision was improper. What I intended to criticize was the manner in which the appropriation was made; that is all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That explanation is no explanation. It does not deceive or delude me at all as to what I thought the gentleman intended to convey by his remarks. There was but one construction to be put upon it. There was as much in the gentleman's manner as what he said, and it was to convey the impression, in connection with the river and harbor bill which was before this House under suspension of the rules, that there was in that bill what is known in common parlance as a "job."

Mr. SAYERS. I disavow any such meaning as the gentleman intimates.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman may disavow.

Mr. SAYERS. I meant that the appropriation ought to have been "$3,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He said that he called the attention of the House to the fact that this bill, which was before this House under suspension of the rules (with his fists clinched) was a bill to pay for the property of the Monongahela Company, and not one member in ten, or rather but very few, knew that it was there. What does that mean? What did that mean? That it ought not to have been there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. CANNON. I yield it to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I simply wish to say that that provision in that bill was inserted upon grounds of high public policy. The Monongahela Company controls the traffic upon that river. It exacts a toll from the enormous tonnage of coal which passes down the river, and thereby adds to the cost of coal to the consumers of this country. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors investigated the subject and saw that there was a net income to that company running up into hundreds and thousands of dollars levied upon the consumers of coal. Therefore the committee, in its wisdom, after carefully looking into the whole matter, decided to insert a provision in the river and harbor bill whereby the Government could take proper proceedings in the United States courts to condemn the property and franchise of that company, so that if the award made by the court was, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, a proper one to be made—and not unless it was proper in the opinion of the Secretary of War—the property should be purchased and the commerce of that river relieved from the unjust burdens imposed upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. In the remaining time that I have I want to say that I am going to ask this committee to stand by me in the consideration of this bill and to finish it to-night. It is desired to-morrow, as I understand, to take up the pension bill, and other business will crowd later in the week, and I desire that we shall send this the last appropriation bill to be passed by the House, with our compliments, to the Senate before we adjourn this evening. It is quite practicable to do it. [Applause.]

Now, as to this item, there has been a good deal of talk about it, but let me call attention for a moment to just what it is. It is $850,000 in addition to the miscellaneous receipts and in addition to the permanent appropriation to collect the customs revenues for the balance of this fiscal year. That is over $700,000 more than it cost to collect the revenues in 1892, when the revenues were far greater than they are this year. It comes from an increase in the number of officials; it comes from an increase of salaries in one custom-house alone of 162 employees. If the circumstances were reversed and a Republican Secretary of the Treasury had done this thing, it would furnish ammunition enough for the Democratic party to conduct a Presidential campaign upon. [Laughter. Applause on the Republican side.] That is all I want to say about it. I surrender the balance of my time and ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Building for Government exhibit, exposition at Atlanta, Ga.: The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the city of Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, all of the right, title, claim, and interest of the United States in and to the building erected for the Government exhibit at the Cotton States and International Exposition recently held in said city.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear some explanation of this paragraph. Probably the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] can give us some information as to why this provision is found in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Georgia points to me, and I will try to explain it. This building cost about $50,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Forty-two thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Forty-two thousand dollars, the gentleman from Georgia says. It is on a park near Atlanta. The Department asks for $500 for the purpose of making a contract to move it off. Our experience in the sale and removal of buildings at Chicago shows that they bring practically nothing, and it seemed to the committee that it was proper enough to give this building to the city of Atlanta, and that the Government would not really lose anything by doing so.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In addition to what the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said, gentlemen, it will be remembered that we got the small sum of $200,000 for our exposition, and that we turned back into the Treasury about $12,000 of that $200,000. More than that, when the Government agents went down there they made up their minds that there was not money enough appropriated to do all the necessary work, and the people of the city of Atlanta and the exposition company went to work and graded the ground for that building. To make a long story short, the city of Atlanta and the exposition company spent $33,000 there for the Government.

Mr. HEPBURN. For the Government exposition?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yea. They built a warehouse for the customs office and did a good many other things, believing that the Government appropriation would not cover them. Now, I would not put this donation upon that ground, but I do say that, with our experience at Chicago in regard to removing buildings, you can not advertise to sell that building and have it removed without it costing you more than you can sell it for.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman can correct me if I am in error, but the people of Georgia, as I understand, do not approve of these expositions, do they?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They do.

Mr. HEPBURN. When we had the national exposition a year or two earlier, did not the State of Georgia refuse to participate? Was not Georgia the only State that did not have a building there, and did not the whole delegation in Congress vote against the appropriation for that enterprise?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The State of Georgia did not refuse to participate. Under the State constitution the legislature of Georgia is prohibited from making any appropriation for anything of that sort.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did not the gentleman from Georgia himself vote against the appropriation for that exposition?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not vote against them all. I voted against some of them, but some of them I voted for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payment to John Ifland: To pay John Ifland, of Port Townsend, Wash., for board and lodging of seven destitute and disabled seamen of the wrecked American schooner C. G. White, in August, 1885, two days, at $2 per day each, $22, and for conveyance from hotel to wharf, $1; in all, $23.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word.

A great deal has been said in the debate here to-day in regard to the falling off in the revenues of this Government and the insufficiency of the revenues derived from the operations of the Wilson bill. I wish to call attention to the fact that for quite a number of years, despite the change in tariff laws, there has been a constant falling off in the revenues of the Government derived from customs. As compared with the fiscal year 1890, the receipts for 1891 from customs fell off $10,146,379.34. For that same year there was an increase of $57,636,198 in the ordinary expenses of the Government. Again, as compared with the fiscal year 1891, the receipts for 1892 for customs fell off $42,069,341. That was under the McKinley law. As compared with the fiscal year 1893, the receipts from customs for 1894 fell off $71,536,486. That, too, was under the McKinley law. There had been a slight increase at one time. As compared with the fiscal year 1894, the receipts for 1895 from customs increased $20,340,086.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the point I desire to make is this, that independently of the McKinley bill (because there was a falling off before it was enacted)—independently of the Wilson bill (there was a falling off before it was enacted)—independently of any of these bills, there is a constant cause in operation that has produced this falling off. When you diminish the capacity of the people to purchase and pay for goods, whether foreign or domestic, there is going to be a falling off in your receipts. Not only was there this falling off in the receipts from customs duties on foreign goods, but there was a falling off in the sale of American goods which resulted in the shutting up of a great many manufactories.

So, gentlemen, there is a constant cause, operating independently of any of these tariff laws, to bring about a constant result—a paralysis of business, a crippling of the Government, and a decreased demand for labor and all its products—and that result, in my judgment, is due to the policy which the majority of the Republican party insists upon continuing to the injury of the people of the country; that policy which the Republican party first foisted upon the people in 1873, and which the great majority of that party continues to advocate, namely, gold monometallism and all its train of attendant evils. That is the real trouble with this country, and Republican so-called "protection" can only aggravate the mischief by throwing almost the entire burden of the gold standard and unequal taxation upon the backs of the farmers and the producing classes, who get no benefit from your McKinley laws.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I move pro forma to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. TERRY] says that whenever the capacity of the people to purchase is diminished the revenues will necessarily be reduced. If he can point to any instance in which the capacity of the American people to purchase has been reduced as under the Wilson-Gorman bill he can have my time in which to make the statement. Neither he nor any other man can point out any such instance. I wish, however, particularly at this time to refer to the section which has been under discussion to-day, providing an additional appropriation for defraying the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs. It was my privilege in the second session of the last Congress to call attention to the increasing deficiency under this head. Back in the seventies and in the eighties there was practically no deficiency for defraying the expenses for collecting the revenue from customs. It is true, as was stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], that the amount which could be used for that purpose has been diminished by the passage of the antimoieties law of 1874 and some other acts; but taking all such matters into consideration, there has still been a general increase in these expenses for some years past; and they are augmenting each and every year.

Under this head, in the Fiftieth Congress, there was in both sessions only $480,000 of deficiency required; in the Fifty-first Congress only $685,000; in the Fifty-second Congress $950,000 was required; and in the very first regular session of the Fifty-third Congress (I have not the complete figures for the whole Congress) the deficiency appropriations passed by this House aggregated more than $500,000. And now, here in the very first year of this Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury asks for an appropriation which, with that already made in the urgent deficiency bill, amounts to $1,235,000 as deficiency in this one matter of collecting the revenue from customs.

Mr. Chairman, this is a case of downright extravagance. It involves an increase of salaries of men who are useless; it involves the addition of nearly 300 to the list of employees. No one can justify this increase. No one on the other side has really attempted to justify it. It is simple extravagance of magnificent proportions for the purpose of keeping Democrats in office. I think that this House should as speedily as possible take some direct action to curb the extravagance of the Treasury Department in this regard. If not, in addition to the $885,000 already appropriated, and nearly an additional million added from general sources, we shall find in the near future, before this Administration closes, that it will take a million and a half or two million dollars of deficiency to meet the extravagant demands of the Treasury Department. I hope the committee at the next session, if not at this—and I pray that they may take it into consideration at this session—will pass some act which will prevent a repetition of this extravagance.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

For old custom-house at Louisville, Ky.: For outstanding liabilities, expenses incident to sale of old custom-house, $911.00.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to pass this item over for the present informally, as I have one or two items that I think ought to be included and which seem to have been omitted by mistake.

Mr. CANNON. I would say to the gentleman from Kentucky if it so turns out it can be attended to by the Senate. I want to finish the bill to-night, if possible.

Mr. EVANS. I do not want to impede the progress of the bill, but this is a matter of some importance that ought to be included.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman another estimate than that furnished already?

Mr. EVANS. I hope to have one during the course of the afternoon.

Mr. CANNON. Well, we can turn back, if correction be necessary.

Mr. EVANS. I would like to pass this over informally.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, there is no doubt that we can get back to it if necessary. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may be permitted to turn back to the item, if desired, hereafter.

Mr. EVANS. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. CANNON. I presume there will be no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 21, page 17 of the bill, after the word "cents," the following: "For unpaid liability allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department and certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the present Congress for payment, $1,000 for use of the court-house of Menard County, Ky., as barracks by the Government of the United States of America, which is directed to be paid to the presiding judge of the county court of said county for use of said county; and for unpaid liability, allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department and certified to the present Congress for payment by the Secretary of the Treasury, $1,000.00 for the use of the court-house of Taylor County, Ky., as barracks by the Government of the United States of America, to be paid to the presiding judge of Taylor County court for the use of said county."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I must make the point of order upon this proposition. There is no estimate certified here for it.

Mr. LEWIS. I understood the gentleman to say that he would not make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is made, of course the Chair will have to sustain it.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to be heard on the point of order. We have already passed, on the fifteenth page of this bill, a paragraph in the following words:

Payment to Pennsylvania Railroad Company: To pay the claims of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and its leased lines, certified in Senate Executive Document No. 6, third session Fifty-third Congress, $14,878.93.

Now the items that I ask to have inserted in the bill and paid are certified by the Secretary of the Treasury in Executive Document No. 234 to the Fifty-third Congress, and not only certified in that, but also in Senate Document No. 189 to this Congress for payment.

Now, if we can embrace in this bill a payment of fourteen thousand and some hundred dollars, certified to the Fifty-third Congress, to a railroad company, as I have just shown, I must confess that I do not understand how the point of order can be made to exclude or prevent the payment of a debt due to the people of the State of Kentucky, a debt which the Government of the United States owes them beyond all question.

This debt has been pending for many years, and it is a just and honest debt of this Government. The people of Kentucky pay into the Treasury of the United States $30,000,000 a year in revenue, and I submit that no pretext against the payment of this paltry sum should be set up on the part of this Government.

But it is said that there is not money enough in the Treasury; that the expenditures of the Government exceed the receipts, and consequently it cannot pay its debts. That is a new plea to me, Mr. Chairman. I was licensed to practice law in 1863, and have been trying to do something in the business ever since until elected a member of this House, and have occupied my seat on this floor and I never yet knew, in all of that time, a man sued for a debt who made the plea that he did not have anything; that he had no money to pay it, and hence judgment ought not to go against him. I do not think that any court in Christendom would regard such a plea as of the slightest possible value, and I am only demanding here the right of the people that I represent at the hands of the Congress of the United States. The proper officers of the Government—the Government itself—acknowledge the use of the property, and that the money is justly due.

Appropriations have been made to pay similar claims to the people of this country for twenty-one years; in fact appropriations were never refused to the people until the Democratic Congress—the Fifty-third Congress—so celebrated in the history of America, in order to make a sham and bogus pretext of economy, refused to pay them. And this Republican Congress will be asked to follow the example of the Fifty-third Congress and refuse to pay this little sum due to the loyal people of Kentucky, a people who are putting into the Treasury of the United States to-day, to pay the expenses of the Government, $30,000,000 a year. Will you refuse a debt that you owe them? You can not do it honestly, and I stand here representing my people to denounce the act, if it is refused, as dishonest, unjust, and a shameless repudiation, which is a disgrace not only to the Congress of the United States, but would be a disgrace to any American citizen in any part of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The only question is whether this is included in the estimate. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois on the subject.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will not make the point of order. The gentleman has made a speech upon the merits, and now I think if I can be heard for five minutes the committee will be ready to vote, if nobody makes the point of order.

Mr. LEWIS. If they can pay this railroad company $14,000 upon a claim certified here, why can they not pay these claims certified to the same Congress and again certified to this Congress in a Senate document.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee, I will say that this amendment covers one of many claims for the occupancy of court-houses in Kentucky, Missouri, and perhaps in other States.

Mr. WASHINGTON. In Tennessee.

Mr. CANNON. The principle would apply to all the States in the late war.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The claim dates back to the time of the war?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. It arises out of the occupation of these court-houses by troops, as they were marching through the country and within the enemy's lines.

Mr. LEWIS. No; Kentucky was not within the enemy's lines.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think sometimes it was, and sometimes it was not. That is my understanding. But I will say—and I want the attention of the committee—this class of claims, including these specific claims, were investigated fifteen years ago by the Treasury Department, and turned down and rejected by Comptroller Upton. There they slept the long sleep until the late Mr. Mansur, of Missouri, was appointed Second Comptroller. When he was appointed Second Comptroller, as I recollect, in a general way, he took up these claims and reversed the former Comptroller, after a period of fifteen years, and audited these claims upon the ground that there was an implied contract between the United States and the court-house or court-houses, that the court-house or court-houses should be paid.

Well, it came up for consideration. It was duly certified to the last Congress. It was fully examined by the subcommittee on deficiencies in the House. The House rejected it. The Senate put it on by way of amendment. It went into conference. The conferees were Representative Breckinridge of Kentucky, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. SAYERS), and I believe I was there as a spectator on the part of the House.

Mr. SAYERS. And took your part in the proceedings, and were loyal to the conferees.

Mr. CANNON. Senator COCKRELL was chairman of the Senate conferees. I will not state what passed in that conference room, but I do state that the matter was put so strongly by the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Texas, myself assenting with my brother conferees, that the Senate receded.

Now, this matter has been referred back to the present Comptroller, and in this document he says he can not reopen it unless he is authorized to do so by a resolution of Congress. I wish Comptroller Mansur had held the same way, because he reopened it after it had slept the sleep of death for fifteen years and passed it.

Now, my judgment is that the safer way is to leave this amendment out and for Congress to direct that the Comptroller reexamine these claims. You will say that the $18,000 or $20,000 for these two court-houses, or whatever the amount is, does not amount to much; but it establishes a principle which, in my judgment, will make the United States, by an implied contract, pay for the occupation of every court-house, every schoolhouse, and perhaps every church that was occupied by the troops during the late war.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to state in response to the distinguished gentleman—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this amendment is exhausted. Mr. LEWIS. I ask a little time in which to respond to the gentleman. I should like ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Will not five minutes answer the gentleman? Mr. LEWIS. Ten minutes. I will conclude my remarks inside of ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman talks about "this class of claims," but in the executive document which I send to him, and which he has, it is shown that the whole amount of this class of claims for the whole country is only $68,000. Now, they have put into this bill without complaint—there was a good deal of debate, but it has been passed—an item of $800,000 to meet deficiencies, as they call them, in paying the expenses of the customs service.

For twenty-one years these appropriations were made upon these claims, certified here to Congress by the Treasury Department, without objection. They have already paid other counties in Kentucky outside of my district for the use of court-houses, and I want to say to the House of Representatives here that because the Federal Government took these court-houses of Meade County and Taylor County, for which I am asking this appropriation, because they used them as barracks, when the Confederates passed through Kentucky in 1862 they burned both these court-houses and destroyed them. They are poor counties. The people of those counties have been taxed $15,000 to $20,000 to build new court-houses. They do not expect to get pay for the court-houses, but for the use of them by the Government that caused them to be destroyed. They do ask the Government to pay them a reasonable rental for the time they used them as forts against the public enemy. That is all they ask.

Now, I do not know what this Comptroller of the Treasury might have done, reversing another Comptroller; but I do know that it is regularly certified to the Congress of the United States in the usual manner for payment, not $16,000, as the gentleman from Illinois says, but in the case of Meade County $1,000, and of Taylor County $1,666.66. That is all that is asked for—$2,666.66.

Mr. STEELE. Is that all the appropriation you are asking for?

Mr. LEWIS. That is all I am asking for. And I want to say further that it is already certified in a Senate document to the present Congress for payment in the document that I sent to the gentleman; and the gentleman is paying in this deficiency bill to this great railroad company—and if it is right they ought to have it—upon a certificate exactly the same as this to the Fifty-third Congress, over $14,800, and yet he stands in the attitude of objecting to and refusing to my people, a patriotic people, a paltry sum, when they pay into the Treasury $30,000,000 in revenue every year, helping to pay this railroad company and other creditors of the Government. He says further that Mr. Breckinridge objected to this in the Fifty-third Congress. Well, I have nothing to say about Mr. Breckinridge. I stand here to say that Mr. Breckinridge does not speak for the Fourth Congressional district, nor does he speak for any part of the people of Kentucky at this time. I do not think that this House will follow Mr. Breckinridge's advice and the example of the Fifty-third Congress in this matter.

I stand here representing a people who were loyal, and always loyal, and who always will be loyal, to the country and to the flag; a people who sent 128,000 brave men to fight the battles of this country, and whose support turned the scales in favor of the Union and the Government of this country. I am simply asking justice for them. When a mere schoolboy I remember the issue in Kentucky, and I heard the great secessionist, John C. Breckinridge, trying to persuade the people of Kentucky to go into secession; and I heard that great man and statesman and leader, John J. Crittenden, appealing to the people. I heard Crittenden say to the people of Kentucky, "Stand by the Union; stand by your Government; stand by the flag; try it, try it, and try it again.

If one Congress will not do you justice, another will." The people of Kentucky followed Crittenden and did stand by the flag and the Government. And I am here to-day asking only justice of this Congress for my people. You may deny it; but the people of Kentucky will still be true and loyal; and if this Congress will not do us justice, they will, following the advice of Crittenden, try another and try again, until the people send here a Congress that will do justice and pay just claims against the United States, a Congress that will despise, as they ought to, repudiation or anything that looks like favoring repudiation of just obligations. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word, and will not take over a minute. Let us understand what this amendment means. I should be glad to vote an appropriation to the gentleman from Kentucky, eloquent and splendid as he is in his advocacy of his amendment. I believe I would on account of the speech he made. But let us see. If we put this appropriation in we establish the principle that it was an implied contract between the Government of the United States and the county authorities that the value should be paid and the damages should be paid for every court-house occupied by the Army during the war, if it was injured. Now, then, it may be that is a good law.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will you allow me—

Mr. CANNON. Comptroller Upton said fifteen years ago it was not good law, and it slept the sleep of the dead until Comptroller Mansur came in, and he on his own motion resurrected and reversed the decision of Comptroller Upton.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman permit me to say he did so over the protest and objection of the Auditor of the Treasury when he considered these claims in the first instance?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly. The Senate tried to get another Comptroller to guess at it, and sent it to Comptroller Bowler, and he says without authority of Congress he has no power to review it, it having been passed upon by a Comptroller. Now, then, before this Congress adjourns I hope there will go on this bill or some other bill a definite provision that will send these cases to the Court of Claims, and let the principle be established, or we will send it for another opinion by the accounting officer of the Treasury; but I think we are not ready to establish the principle now. I am ready for a vote.

Mr. COX. Does not the principle involved include the occupation of churches, schoolhouses, and everything of that kind?

Mr. CANNON. In my opinion it does.

Mr. COX. What is the distinction that can be drawn between them?

Mr. DINGLEY. Why not private houses and all other places, thus paying for the damages of the war?

Mr. CANNON. I do not think private property would come within the principle.

Mr. COX. But churches and schoolhouses would.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly schoolhouses and court-houses would.

Mr. COX. And churches.

Mr. CANNON. And possibly churches on the same ground.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If I will draw an amendment will the gentleman accept it, that all claims not appropriated for go to the Court of Claims, with jurisdiction vested in that court to determine them in a judgment.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend, no. There are all the intimations that are usually given that the Senate is ready to amend this bill by putting on these claims; and I will say to the gentleman that if the House honors me as a conferee I will do what I can to work out a re-reference of these claims, so that we can get the correct principle fully established and the cases disposed of.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But will the gentleman give the Court of Claims authority to pass upon these questions?

Mr. CANNON. It is not practicable here and now to prepare such a provision. I withdraw my amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LEWIS rose.

Mr. CANNON. How much time does the gentleman desire? If five minutes will satisfy him, I will ask that at the end of five minutes we may have a vote.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know, nor has it been explained, what Comptroller of the Treasury or what other official of this great Government certified this claim of $14,883.93 of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Neither have I heard it proposed to refer that claim back or to refer it to the Court of Claims. That was certified to the Fifty-third Congress, just like the claim that I ask to have paid.

Mr. BRUMM. Has the claim which this amendment covers ever gone through the committee?

Mr. LEWIS. I think it has.

Mr. BRUMM. Not through the Committee on Claims; it may have gone through the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not know; but at any rate it is here regularly; certified in the regular way.

Mr. BRUMM. But in this Congress has it gone through the regular committee?

Mr. LEWIS. I think not. It was certified, just as this railroad claim was certified. Now, in addition to what I have said, I want to say this. It would take just six of the claims that I ask to have paid to pay this railroad company's claim which is allowed in this bill. We stand in this Congress in the attitude of allowing that claim, which was certified to the Fifty-third Congress, and at the same time rejecting this claim of the people of Kentucky, which was certified to the Fifty-third Congress and which has been certified by the proper officers of the Treasury and by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Fifty-fourth Congress also. Gentlemen need not be scared about this opening up a channel through which the Government can be flooded with claims. This House has already passed bills carrying $500,000,000, and if Uncle Sam can pack that load I am sure that this small pittance for the people of Kentucky, who give him thirty millions a year, will not break his back. [Laughter.] I am sure, too, that this Republican House, when the people of Kentucky have contributed five Representatives to the majority, and, barring myself, as good men as ever came to Congress, will not be guilty of the mean, the niggardly, the dishonest, the unjust discrimination of refusing them this paltry appropriation which is their due.

The question being taken on the amendment, the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to prevail.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 54.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 17, line 21, strike out "eleven" and insert in lieu thereof "sixty-one."

Mr. CANNON. That is a revised estimate.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I now move to strike out the paragraph beginning on line 3, page 15, and ending on line 8, on the same page.

Mr. CANNON. I make the point that that paragraph has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIGHT-HOUSE ESTABLISHMENT.

Expenses of light vessels: For expenses of light vessels for the fiscal year 1894, to adjust the account of Commander M. R. S. Mackenzie, United States Navy, Inspector of the Ninth light-house district, for expenditures made from the appropriation "Expenses of fog signals," 1894, for the services of the Davis Coast Wrecking Company in recovering and floating Rattlesnake Shoal light-ship, South Carolina, No. 34, held by the Commissioner of Customs not properly chargeable to said appropriation, $2,000: Provided, That this shall not involve the further payment of money from the Treasury.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Something has been said to-day by my affable and distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] relative to the fact that the Republican party in this session of Congress has not repealed the Wilson tariff bill. I want to tell my friend that the Republican party in this session of Congress has its eyes in the front of its head. It looks ahead and does not, like a mule, kick behind. [Laughter.] We sometimes wonder here why, if our Democratic friends are possessed of such great foresight as they claim, they should have passed the Wilson bill in this House when they knew that it would be repudiated, absolutely repudiated, in the Senate of the United States and denounced and derided by the President.

The Republican party stands in this Congress ready to pass a tariff bill that will give every man labor, that will start every spindle running and every wheel turning, but it is not ready to waste its sweetness upon the desert air, knowing what will be done at the other end of the Capitol and at the other end of the Avenue. The Republican party is a party of foresight, and during thirty years of Republican rule never one bond was issued to pay the expenses of running this Government. Under the McKinley law and under every other law enacted by the Republican party we were always able to get revenue enough into our Treasury to pay the running expenses of the Government and to pay off besides over $2,000,000,000 of public debt. The Democratic party, on the other hand, with all its boasting for the purpose of making political capital, has never paid off $500,000,000 of the public debt from the day of Thomas Jefferson down to the present. [Laughter and derisive cheers on the Democratic side.] You may laugh, gentlemen, but you will sorrow after the St. Louis convention, when the Republican party, having nominated some great big protectionist who represents the protective tariff policy, who represents sound and honest money, while you are struggling and fighting in your Chicago convention, splitting and dividing off and scattering yourselves to the four winds of the earth, the Republican candidates will be in the field and will be running on to victory. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

That on and after July 1, 1896, all expenditures on account of the Reform School for Boys, the Girls' Reform School, and the board of children's guardians shall be made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon itemized vouchers approved by the auditor of the District and certified by the Commissioners, as required by the act of June 11, 1878, in the case of other expenses of the government of the District of Columbia. And all acts or parts of acts providing for treasurers for the institutions herein named are hereby repealed, to take effect June 30, 1896.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I make a point of order on this whole paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman whether he is determined to insist on that point of order?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I am.

Mr. CANNON. Well, with the single statement that the legislation here proposed would give better service and save $3,000, I will concede that the point of order is well taken and let the paragraph go out.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Accounts of Pay Director H. M. Denniston: The accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to pass the voucher, under the appropriation "Pay, miscellaneous, 1895," from which it was paid by Pay Director H. M. Denniston, United States Navy, namely: For services of a detective agency, $445.64.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I offer an amendment, to which I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the paragraph just read the following:

"Publication of records of the Continental Congress, together with all the official documents relating to the Revolutionary period now in the custody of the Secretary of State, and which have not heretofore been published, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of State."

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] that this amendment is subject to a point of order; and I shall have to make it.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Of course, if the chairman of the committee makes the point of order, without allowing any discussion, I have no opportunity to explain the amendment; but if he will withdraw his point of order—

Mr. CANNON. If it were not so late, and if we did not want to finish the bill this evening—

Mr. WASHINGTON. My friend knows that I never take up time unnecessarily.

Mr. CANNON. I shall have to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowance to the following contestants and contestees, audited and recommended by the Committee on Elections, for expenses incurred by them in contested-election cases, namely:

To H. R. Belknap, $2,000;
To L. E. McGann, $1,522.86;
To James E. Cobb, $2,000;
To W. F. Aldrich, $2,000;
To G. A. Robbins, $2,000;
To H. St. George Tucker, $1,971.96;
To G. W. Cornett, $1,350;
To J. L. McLaurin, $2,000;
To C. A. Swanson, $1,350;
To D. B. Culbertson, $750;
To Oscar W. Underwood, $2,000;
To George P. Harrison, $2,000;
To Joshua E. Wilson, $2,000;
To Ashbury C. Latimer, $2,000;
To Miles Crowley, $2,000;
To William Elliott, $2,000;
To J. W. Stokes, $2,000;
To John I. Rinaker, $2,000;
To W. C. Owens, $1,903.05;
To John W. Maddox, $2,000;
To Truman H. Aldrich, $2,000;
To Albert T. Goodwyn, $2,000;
To James C. Spencer, $350;
To A. M. Newman, $350;
To John S. Williams, $175;
To Peter J. Otey, $1,350;
To Jerome C. Kearby, $2,000;
To A. J. Rosenthal, $2,000;
To Jo Abbott, $2,000; in all, $40,162.87.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 66, in lines 13 and 16, strike out "three" and insert "seven."
On page 67, in line 7, strike out "three" and insert "five."
On page 67, in line 15, strike out "forty-nine" and insert "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, these amendments will be agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand that Election Committee No. 2 have not yet certified to the Committee on Appropriations the expenses of either contestants or contestees, but that the Committee on Appropriations will investigate the certification to be hereafter made, and will send the items to the Senate for consideration.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. CANNON was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Charles Carter and Erasmus Green for caring for subcommittee rooms of the Committee on Appropriations and Ways and Means, $75 each, $150.

Mr. PICKLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the paragraph just read the following:

"To pay W. H. Blanchard, as extra compensation for services rendered as assistant clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, $500."

Mr. CANNON. That is the usual provision for the assistant clerk of that committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay L. B. Cook, George Winters, R. W. Goudelock, C. L. Williams, Edwin Giddings, and Ralph M. Dale, each, the difference between $1,500 and $1,100 per annum, as conductors of the elevators, from July 1, 1894, to July 1, 1896, $900.

Mr. CANNON. To correct an error I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, in line 16, after the words "eighteen hundred and ninety-six," strike out "six" and insert "eight."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For Life-Saving Service, $585.67.
For supplies of light-houses, $16.56.
For expenses of buoyage, $98.95.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in line 6, page 75, of the bill by inserting the following words:
"For repaying to the State of Kentucky the sum of $22,022.31, amount due said State for expenses incurred in raising troops during the war of the rebellion, as reported in Senate Document No. 75, Fifty-fourth Congress."

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think I must make the point of order on that amendment. We have had nothing certified to the House, as far as I am aware, in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. EVANS. Is there any provision of the rule—if so, I would be glad if the gentleman will point it out—that requires a matter of this kind to be certified to the House before it can be considered by the House?

Mr. CANNON. I will state to the gentleman that the law requires that the audited accounts shall be certified to Congress for consideration. The Senate has a way of at times getting certificates that the House does not get, and acting upon them; and the best way, when they do get such matters, is to let them perform. The House is not in the habit of dealing with these matters until they come to it in the shape of audited and certified accounts.

Of course I have not given this matter any examination; knew nothing about it until this moment, and had had no opportunity, according to my recollection, of giving it any examination. But it seems to me that under the rule it is not before the House, under the law, as a certified claim.

Mr. EVANS. I will address myself entirely to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois, because if there is any rule that forbids such an amendment to the bill it is a rule that has entirely escaped my observation.

Here is a claim from the State of Kentucky; a claim that is reported by the Auditor of the Treasury Department to be, on a certain calculation, a justly due claim to the amount of $22,022.31. That document, in which this claim is embodied, is an executive document sent to the Senate, and the paper in question is signed by T. Stobo Farrow, Auditor. The communication is addressed to Hon. John G. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, and sets forth these various claims of the States in a table which appears in the paper.

I have no doubt that the amount is due and that it has been due for many years.

Mr. CANNON. What is the date of this certificate to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. EVANS. The Secretary's letter, transmitting this matter to the President of the Senate, is dated January 15, 1896, and as to the certificate of the Auditor, I do not know the date, as it is not appended.

Mr. CANNON. I think that is hardly a certification in terms under the rule that we adopt here, but if the gentleman will permit me I will examine the document.

Mr. EVANS. Here is the document.

Mr. CANNON (after examining the paper). I find, if the gentleman will allow me, the following language:

Under the proposed modifications as suggested by the Second Comptroller (Exhibit B) and as directed by the order of February 8, 1896, the claims of but one State, New York, were examined, when, on March 29, 1896, the Secretary of the Treasury issued the following order:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 29, 1896.

"Respectfully referred to the honorable Second Comptroller. Upon further consideration I approve the recommendation of Assistant Secretary Lamberton, and decline to modify the rules as suggested by the Second Comptroller. The order of Secretary Foster of February 8, 1896, hereto attached, is accordingly revoked.

"J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary."

Then further on I find the following language:

On receipt of the order of March 29, 1896, further examinations ceased.

Taking now as a provisional standard the modifications suggested, there would be due to the several States the following sums if the proposed change in the rules should finally be adopted:

The trouble is that Mr. Foster adopted one rule and Mr. Carlisle revoked it. Now, the Auditor says that if the Foster rule were adopted the account, which he appends, including the amount that the gentleman has fixed in his amendment for the State of Kentucky, would be due.

But it does not come within the provisions of the law, and is so far a mere claim. It is not audited as the rule requires, and the Chair understands the distinction where the law calls for a certification. It is not ascertained and certified under the law for the consideration of Congress. The gentleman will see for himself that that is the exact condition. It is a mere communication to the Senate, and not an audited claim. On its face it shows that it never was audited, as the Chair will see on examination.

The CHAIRMAN. On the statement of the gentleman from Illinois the Chair must sustain the point of order.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman does not point out any provision under our rules requiring that an amendment shall be based on an audited claim.

Mr. CANNON. Our rules now provide, in the first place, the general rule, that we shall care for the service of the Government of the United States for the coming year and for the present year, and then the custom obtains of appropriating for deficiencies of former years where they have been adjudicated. An audited claim stands on the same ground as a judgment of the Court of Claims, but until they have been so audited we do not take cognizance of them in the deficiency appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I ask unanimous consent to return to line 10, page 68.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman wishes to recur to page 68 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked to recur to page 68, line 10. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert in line 10, page 68, the following:

"To pay D. S. Porter, for extra services as assistant clerk Committee on Pensions, $300."

Mr. CANNON. That is the usual appropriation to the assistant clerk of that committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

And then (on motion of Mr. CANNON) the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8293) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That on Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal, it shall be in order to take up House bill 8271 and discuss the same in general debate until after the reading of the Journal Friday, when the previous question shall be considered as ordered and the vote shall be taken on the bill.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. What bill is that?

Mr. HENDERSON. The general pension bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does the gentleman propose in this rule to discuss the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. DINGLEY. No; the resolution provides for general debate.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The effect of this resolution would be to shut out all amendments.

Mr. PICKLER. This provides for general debate. It is in the power of the House to make such order as it may desire for debate in addition to this.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why not specify now what time shall be devoted to the consideration of the bill by paragraphs, so there will be no mistake about the matter?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Is it understood that general debate shall be continued until Friday?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. I should not think it would be necessary to have so long a time as that.

Mr. PICKLER. It is probable that an election case will come in somewhere during that time. Provision is intended to be made for that.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Oh, if you introduce other matters—

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that under this order he would of course rule that the general debate would continue until the close of Thursday, and that a vote would be taken on the bill as a whole the next day. It is proper that the Chair should make that statement.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I insist upon the gentleman setting apart a portion of this time for debate under the five-minute rule, so that we can offer amendments if we want to.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Give us the last day.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Give us the last day.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. I want to understand what is the character of the proposition? What is the point?

The SPEAKER. It is a pension bill, which is numbered in the resolution H. R. 8271.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How far does that bill go? What is the proposition involved?

Mr. PICKLER. It relates to the administration of the Pension Office.

Mr. CANNON. Why should we not have a vote, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution will say "aye."

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked if a second was demanded, and no one asked for it. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

The question was taken.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ALLEN) there were—ayes 62, nays 5.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is plainly no quorum present.

And then, on motion of Mr. DINGLEY (at 6 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.
